ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The idea for this thesis began with a suggestion from my esteemed supervisor Prof. Chintamani Mahapatra to look for a parallel if there was any, between the underprivileged in the United States and India, considering my orientation towards soft politics. I cannot thank him enough for his unwavering support and compassionate handling of my research. A discussion with Gail Omvedt deserves a special mention for introducing me to a phenomenon called Black Panther Party of Oakland in the United States and formation of Dalit Panthers at Bombay drawing inspiration from their American counterpart. Dhrub extended immense support at all stages starting from conceptualizing this work while making a research proposal to suggesting some of the best biographies and also getting copies of these.

Institutional support in the form of much needed fellowships which financed my field trips came from SARAI, Center for Study of Developing Societies, Indian Council of Social Science Research (ICSSR), School of International Studies, JNU.

I would like to thank Aravind A. Pole and L. D. Bhosle of Pune and Arjun Dangle of Bombay for providing me a roadmap of meeting important people with significant inputs on my research. Jalandhar G. Kirtikar at Worli had a volume of archival material in his possession which he was kind enough to share with me. I wish to thank, Dowoti Desir, the Executive Director of the Malcolm X & Dr. Betty Shabazz Center; Betty Odabashian, Reference Librarian at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture for providing free access to reference material and facilitating interviews with activists, academicians and former Black Panthers. Bill Jennings and his in house archive at Sacramento provided me an opportunity to access original Black Panther newspapers, pamphlets etc. Special thanks to Ula Y Taylor for arranging interviews with Black Panthers.

Staff at Centre for Contemporary Black History; UC Berkeley library; University of California Los Angeles library; Berkley public library and library at Columbia University were particularly helpful during my library visits.

My heartfelt gratitude to all those who made me feel at home and played generous hosts during my fieldtrips: Pooja and Shivraj in Bombay; B. S. Waghmare in Aurangabad; Anurag and Megha in San Francisco; Shelina and Sandeep at Los Angeles; Padmini and Tyler at Manhattan.

Last but not the least I thank all my FRIENDS for their constant support in the course of this research.

Needless to mention any omissions in this work are my responsibility.
