ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

In presenting a thesis on Juvenile Justice, Child Right and the State in India I have attempted to bring together my practical field experience over 15-years in the field of Rights of the Child and as a researcher of Law and Governance. My professional interest in the subject started way back in 1993 when I had a unique opportunity to participate in an Orientation Training Programme at National Institute for Public Cooperation and Child Development (NIPCCD) just after completion of my training in law. It was a time when the shift in legal and policy orientation started showing its impact as by then the Indian govt. had ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child as a State Party just before one year on 11th December 1992. I attended this programme on behalf of Committee for Legal Aid to Poor (CLAP) in the capacity of its Legal Advisor and Executive Vice President. Since then I spent years together visualising a framework for Rights of the Child which is easily available, accessible and also deliverable to children living under difficult circumstances. I envisioned a legal framework which is also theoretically sound and practically possible. This desire finally landed me in an academic institute like Jawaharlal Nehru University which is distinctively unique for its research environment, unparalleled as a premier academic body and topmost among the universities in India.

I am beholden to the generous academia of the Centre for Study of Law and Governance at the Jawaharlal Nehru University for having selected me to undertake a research from the perspective of Law and Governance. It is needless to say that this Centre emerges as a Centre of excellence in the contemporary society to study various dimensions of law and governance in a democratic set up. I consider it a great privilege to have been given a space to undertake my research. I am sincerely grateful to the entire faculty of the Centre.

I really fall short of words to express my heartfelt regards to my Supervisor Prof. Dr. Amita Singh for her incredible guidance, infinite support and sympathy towards me at every stage of research. She not only provided me an insight into the scholarship on the theme but also inculcated confidence in me to acquire power to examine the subject objectively. After working under her for little over 5 years I have carried the impression that above everything she is a warm humanist, academically unorthodox and basically a progressive educationist. I have been fortunate in receiving her valuable guidance which enabled me to produce this thesis. I have also acquired many debts to her.

It is an occasion to revisit the reminiscences of the initial period at JNU for preparation of synopsis for the research. I have very fond memories of the significant contribution of Prof. Nandini Sundar, the then faculty in our Centre who is currently a faculty in Delhi University who systematically guided me to articulate the research problem in a right perspective and formulate the method to advance my argument. At the time of losing confidence to come out with a synopsis, she extended her support by sitting with me to draw the plans for the research. My thanks to her for the ideas and for her encouragement.
I gratefully acknowledge the patronage of Prof. Nirija Gopal Jayal the most revered Chairperson of our Centre who was always a source of inspiration for a qualitative legal research. Her contribution in conceptualising my research synopsis at its initial stage is remarkable. She made me understand that in the present context researchers on the theme of children need to expand their area by tracing the framework of rights of the child. A subject as important like juvenile justice needs to be thoroughly understood from the theoretical perspective of rights of the child.

I am not only grateful to the above named professors but also unhesitatingly indebted towards all the faculty of the Centre for Study of Law and Governance like Prof. Amit Prakash, Prof. Jaiveer Singh, Prof. Janifer Jalan, et al for their scholarly guidance in various form. In this regard I must respectfully acknowledge the role of Prof. Kuldip Mathur and Prof. Pratap Bhanu Mehta who were the icons for me at the initial stage of my research who had enabled me to understand the dialectics and dynamics of research in law and governance.

The Centre for Study of Law and Governance is a dynamic Centre of learning the innovations in governance and legal dimensions of it. It provided adequate exposure to a real world of research on many emerging scholarships in and around law and governance. The debates and discourses that takes place continuously in the Centre leaves a long term impact on scholars to discover ideas and arguments in support of their ideals and philosophies. I gratefully pay my respect to the esteemed Centre for the incomparable learning environment it offered to me.

Apart from the above the administrative staff at the Centre and the Librarian also contributed in several ways which were seemingly important for any researchers. My friends in the Centre like Alankar, Mani Kandan, Anandita Pujari, Rakhi Rashmi, Sruti Sharma and Nimisha Jha also played a commendable role in making of a qualitative research by always bringing to attention various notions of research. Alankar and Mani Kandan were incredible for their tolerance to hear my arguments and my approach to the research in spite of the fact that this is a very different topic from their area. They not only patiently heard my views but also significantly helped me in shaping the framework.

A contribution of unparalleled scale had been made by my professional colleague and friend Purusottam Sahoo all through the research. Unhesitatingly he voluntarily took up the role of a co-researcher by helping me in documenting case materials, research data and computerisation of research findings. Similarly, a comparatively junior colleagues in my profession such as Chittaranjan Mohanty, Ramakanta Satapathy, Ramesh Mandal, Pramod Kumar Acharya, Krupasindhu Nayak, Bijaya Mishra, Siva Prasad Murmu, Bijayashree Barik and Bibhu Prasad Chhualsingh made a tremendous amount of investigative support to my research by helping me in reaching out to the subjects of my research in Orissa. The role of Ramakanta Satapathy is commendable as he played the role of a friend, philosopher and guide to engage me in my research. Sidheswar Mohanty a senior advocate of Orissa High Court and Bhaktabatsal Mohanty a social activist of high repute also made an impressive impact on my field research by bringing to my attention various aspects of judicial response to cases of juvenile.

This research is made possible through ardent philosophical endeavour of my father Shyam Sundar Das, a life time Gandhian who believes in an entitlement approach to ameliorate the condition of deprivation and Prof. Karnadeva Muduli who both had given me enough exposure not only to law but also the realities of society. At every step of research I constantly discussed the progress of my work which got enriched in return with their scholarly remarks. Yet another significant person in this research is my wife Subhashree Das who not only managed all my day to day responsibility during the period of research on behalf of me but also she had a large contribution in terms of shaping the arguments. She also tolerated me hearing my arguments every now and then. I must also acknowledge the sacrifice of little daughter Satavisa who silently accepted my absence frequently for the research work. I shall ever be obliged to all of the above for their kindness and greatness.

The thesis could find a shape due to the contribution of Manoj Behera and Maheswar Khilar who helped me collecting information, typesetting, delivery of outputs in right time and sacrificing their own interest for the greater good of children. I owe my sincere gratitude to them.
Finally, I express with gratitude my sincere thanks to Committee for Legal Aid to Poor (CLAP) and Bernard van Leer Foundation, The Netherlands who actually enabled me to carry forward my mission for shaping the future of children by law. Due to their profound cooperation I could undertake a project to explore the legal framework for protection of rights of children in India in the nomenclature of In Defence of Child Project. Here I really had the occasion to experiment a kind of child right activism which is now being theorised in the form of a thesis. My special thanks to both the organisation. Similarly, the credit of the entire work goes to Children of India whose present is so important in this research and I wish the future shall be fit for children.
