ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Writing a thesis is selfish business. It means putting on hold the legitimate claims that people close to you have on your time and energy, while continuing to make huge demands on theirs. At different (low) points in the course of its completion, I have been sustained by the time, energy, money, faith, food, warmth and goodwill of family, friends, and colleagues, too numerous here to cite individually, as well as by random acts of kindness from strangers and acquaintances. I am deeply grateful to each and every one of them, but especially to Natasha and Meenu.

Susan, Ashley, Antara, and Natasha have read, proofed and/or commented on the Introduction and Part I of this thesis. I value both their appraisal and their labour. Chitra, especially, I thank, for her prompt and frank review, given the time constraints on her. I am hugely indebted to Prof. Udaya Kumar and Mr. Arjun Mahey for having read and commented on earlier drafts of the chapter, “Pretexts of Desire” (the former, also some bits of “Novel Desires”). Both have been generous with their time and expertise on different occasions subsequently, as well. Their willingness to engage with my work and critical encouragement helped negotiate a not insignificant crisis in confidence in the early stages of writing this thesis. Dr. G. J. V. Prasad, I thank, for having lent me books and for his readiness to clarify doubts whenever I have approached him with any.

Prof. Makarand Paranjape, my Supervisor, I owe big time and for many, many things, not all of which I am even fully clear about. The “Mak Effect” on me, over the years, has been both potent and unsettling as well as fundamentally revitalising. Among other things, I thank him for the generosity of spirit with which he has always engaged with me, especially since our interactions have been often “difficult.”

Finally, this work is dedicated to my mother—in many ways, the anchor of my being.

Sharon Pillai