ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

There are several individuals to whom I am grateful for their assistance in this study. I thank Prof. Valerian Rodrigues, the supervisor of the thesis, for his scholarship, incisive analysis and critical perception of the issues that mattered most for the study. The discussions I had with him were robust and would energize and inspire my continuing efforts at the completion of the thesis. I am immensely grateful to him for accompanying this study with ready availability, unstinted support and keen interest.

I acknowledge my deep gratitude to the participants, interviewees and interpreters who provided the data for the study. But for their singular honesty, understanding, patience, and cooperation this study would not have been possible. I would have liked to name each of them here, but the list is long. A list of interviewees appears in the appendix. I am immensely grateful to them and many more who participated in this undertaking.

I would especially like to thank Mike Kolb for his personal concern and guidance during the entire study. He has followed this work right from its inception and has been a source of inspiration. I remain indebted to him for proof-reading the entire text and for his critical comments.

My thinking on customary law has evolved during the last four years due to my continuous discussions and interactions with Dr. Walter Fernandes. I owe a great deal of gratitude to him. Among other individuals who extended their support in this stimulating intellectual journey were Dr. Rudolf Heredia, Dr. Alphonsus D’Souza, Dr. Philip Abraham, Stephen Yanthan, Neiba Bernard Pienyū, Ravi Sagar and Xavier Jeyaraj. I am grateful to them for their assistance at various stages of the study which helped focusing my thinking and in the better presentation of the thesis.

The Jesuits at St. Paul Institute of Education, Phesama, and Fr. Victor Gorla at Cathedral Parish, Tura, served as warm hosts during the days of data collection in Nagaland and Meghalaya. I am grateful to them and also to several others who made my field study an enriching experience.

I am also indebted to Anand Pereira, Richard Jarain, Lancy Monteiro, John Sealey, Lydia Cooley, Liceria Pinto, Walter Pereira, Amanda Pereira, and Mervyn Pinto for their generous help in providing me with books that were not available in India.

Finally, I offer my deep appreciation to the Indian Social Institute Jesuit community for providing me with accommodation and companionship during these past years. The library of Indian Social Institute served my requirements for reference work on literature surrounding customary law. I remain grateful to the library staff for their ready assistance.
