My friends in the Centre for the Study of Social Systems and the office of the School of Social Sciences, JNU, have been extremely helpful especially in matters related to administration.

My friends at The Deccan Development Society, Hyderabad, generously allowed me use of their computer. Much of this thesis was written in the office of the DDS. I wish to say a special word of thanks to Yadagiri and Ranga for their help with typing and printing earlier drafts.

The National Institute of Rural Development, Hyderabad, offered me institutional support in the final and most crucial stage of writing this thesis. I am especially indebted to Mr. T.L.Sankar, Director General, NIRD, for making this possible and for allowing me the space to pursue my work undisturbed.

Needless to say, my families, natal and affinal, have been responsible for seeing me through the most trying times.

My father-in-law, T. Ramaiah, has been extremely supportive of my work.
I can only name those who have inspired me all along and whose involvement in this project has been as much, if not greater, than my own: K.G. Kannabiran, my father, Vasanth Kannabiran, my mother, Indira Jena, my mother, Raj Mohan Tella, my husband, and R. Chudamani, my maternal grandmother.

Finally, this is my tribute to the memory of my great grandfather, A.S. Ramaswami Iyengar, who was impatient to read this work and almost lived to see it done.
