ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This rather long dissertation began at the suggestion of Professor V.M. Dadékar, who had provided me with the opportunity of working in the project 'Leadership Training for Rural Women' at the Indian School of Political Economy. I have for long been attempting to study the women question through available literature as well as exposure to some of the active groups and their work. The exact direction for the present work emerged out of the several stimulating discussions I had with Professor Dadékar. I am extremely grateful both for his sound advice as well as sharp criticism which kept me from wandering off into the less relevant areas of this subject. This, coupled with total freedom of opinion provided me with an ideal research environment.

I am equally grateful to Professor Y.B. Dadle, my guide, with whom I have worked these three years. His guidance and insight into the contemporary social developments in the West have been very valuable. His critical reading and comments have saved me from errors of fact and judgement. I am thankful to him for giving so much of his valuable time.

I am primarily a student of language and literature. This excursion of mine into the area of social sciences would have been virtually impossible without Professor Ram Bapat whose illuminating guidance helped me see the various political ideologies, social theories and their impact on feminism.

My friends Sonya Gill and Rajendra Vora have contributed substantially to my effort by giving advice and active support throughout the dissertation work. My thanks are also due to Shri K.P. Limbore for his efficient typing and re-typing of my thesis.

Finally I want to thank my family, in particular Ravi, Chinu and my parents-in-law. They have shared all my agonies of these three years, and often been the willing recipients of my frustrations as well. While I was trying to grapple academically with the question of feminism, they had to bear the brunt of my endeavours.
