It was Dr. Mohan Rao, my supervisor, who first introduced me to a critique on birth control movements and population policies through a course in my M.Phil. Programme. An assignment on critical perspectives in anthropology on demography marked the beginning of this work. As a teacher and supervisor, he has been very much understanding and reassuring. He has put in his best efforts and plenty of time in shaping this work at all its stages.

Apart from my supervisor and teachers at the Centre of Social Medicine and Community Health, this work has made me indebted to number of people in lot many ways. The help that all my friends have rendered to this work is immense, invaluable. Their thoughtful, timely, physical and monetary support to my family and me, the way they cared my family when I was away on my field work, the sleepless nights they spent when my little daughter was unwell, the strength they gave, their love and the liberty they took in me, everything is ingrained in this work. I am particularly indebted to Srinivasan for all the support rendered by him and his ill-tempered computer. With Srinivasan I took the liberty of bothering him at time of a day. I am thankful to Ramakrishnan, P. Vananthi and Lucas Anbarasu for their timely help in typing and seeing the proof.

The endless discussions with friends, discussions at JNU Tamil Vasakar Vattam and at Kovai kalam were of great use and has sensitised me to number of issues related to Tamil culture and history, caste and gender, and has provided a broader understanding of the problem of my research and to situate it within a precise socio-political context. However, the views and formulations advanced in this work are solely of mine and no one else is responsible.

I am grateful to the staff of libraries at Jawaharlal Nehru University, Nehru Memorial Library, Madras Institute of Development Studies and the Documentation Unit at the Centre of Social Medicine and Community Health for their help. I am also thankful to the office staff at the Centre of Social Medicine and Community Health.

I am indebted to my parents, aunt and my uncle for the moral strength and financial support they have provided, and to my brothers' and sister's family, on all of whom I have been piling on mercilessly.

My wife, Santhi, and my little daughter, Barathi, have suffered the most during this long period of study. They had to bear with my sustained irresponsibility. It is at the expense of their time and efforts that I have worked. Without their constant support and strength this work would have not been completed.
