Tibetan community in exile is arguably one of the most resilient and successful refugee groups in the world. I used to make occasional visits to a Tibetan refugee settlement in Delhi as a graduate student of Sociology from 1996 to 98. The brief glimpse of life in a Tibetan settlement appeared to me back then to suggest just that and this served as a signpost for later research enquiries into refugee life and diasporas for my Ph.D. thesis. Having seen this research study through to this fruition now, I cannot help but feel a great debt of gratitude to all those who made it possible. Along the way I have benefited immensely from my supervisors, Dr. Ruby Sain of the Department of Sociology at Jadavpur University and Professor Pradip Kumar Bose of the Centre for Studies in Social Sciences, Calcutta for their finely tuned critical advice, encouragement and inspiration.

It is impossible to offer individual thanks to all the Tibetan exiles and few members of the Bhutia community in Darjeeling who, as my interlocutors, effectively gave form to this work. I respect their wishes for anonymity. I would like to single out few persons in Darjeeling, though, who helped me in many ways to either begin or follow through with my field study by providing unstinting support and friendship. I am deeply indebted to K.T. Bhutia who first introduced me to Darjeeling town and to the life of Tibetans beginning in 2004. I would not have been able to progress an inch without his help and hospitality. My heart-felt thanks go to Dawa Tshering Amdo who facilitated entry into the Tibetan Refugee Self Help Centre in Darjeeling town. Dawa told me so much about the Tibetan issue and it served as a torch for illuminating many aspects of Tibetan refugee culture. I am particularly grateful to Narpati Sharma and his family and Sonam Bhutia for sharing their house with me. They made me feel at home in Darjeeling. I benefited greatly from discussions with the Tibetan scholar, Ngawang Jinpa in Darjeeling who shared his often-times personal opinions about the Tibetan issue.

I owe thanks to the Indian Council for Social Science Research for funding my research study from 2004-05. My stint at the Institute of Development Studies Kolkata while I was pursuing my doctoral work has been extremely beneficial in all respects. I am extremely grateful to Professor Amiya Kumar Bagchi, the Director of the Institute of Development Studies Kolkata and Dr. Ramkrishna Chatterjee, Assistant Secretary of the Institute for providing an excellent academic environment and encouragement when I needed it most. Madhusri Ghosh, librarian at the Institute was an invaluable source of help. Bidhan Kanti Das and Subrata Mukherjee, my colleagues at the Institute gave me great company and inspired me with their talents and humour.

I was especially fortunate to get few choice comments from Dr. Rabindra Ray of the Department of Sociology at the Delhi School of Economics at an earlier stage of this research work in Darjeeling. The critical feedback that I received from the participants in the International Cultural Studies Workshop on Political Cultures held in Hyderabad from 28th January to 2nd February 2007 made this research work richer. I benefited greatly from the valuable comments and suggestions offered by participants on the paper that I presented in two more Workshops and Conferences, the one in Centre for Study of Developing Societies, Delhi from 24th to 25th March 2008 and the other in Central European University, Budapest, Hungary from 20th to 22nd June 2008. I specially thank Subhojoy Gupta and Sarasij Majumdar for providing valuable articles that I would never have been able to get.

Finally, I offer deep respect and gratitude to my family for their love and support. Anurima, my wife provided constant encouragement at every stage of the research study. My son, Samik made my life richer and took away the agonizing moments from the doctoral work. My parents and my brother were the deepest sources of inspiration and guidance over all these years.
