ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

My warmest thanks are due to Prof. Tanika Sarkar, who supervised my doctoral research with great patience and encouragement. She has always kept me mindful of the historian’s craft and exacted a measure of rigour in the work; its faults are entirely mine. I cannot quite say how much confidence I have gained from her consistent kindness and her faith in my abilities. My association with her over the last few years has been deeply rewarding and enriching, academically and personally.

There are other teachers from whom I have learnt much. Prof. Neeladri Bhattacharya and Prof. Majid Siddiqui at the Centre for Historical Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, gave me an early training in the method of history. Dr. Ratna Kapur at the Centre for Feminist Legal Research (CFLR), New Delhi has been an excellent and committed mentor, who introduced me to a great deal of the theoretical literature that I engage with in the thesis. She guided me painstakingly while I was a voluntary researcher at CFLR and has continued to take an interest in my academic endeavours since.

I owe many thanks to the Law School at Keele University, UK, for hosting me as a visiting researcher under their Gender, Sexuality and Law visiting fellowship programme. I was provided with many opportunities to present my work during my stay: the feedback I received at conferences and in conversations at Keele have helped sharpen the arguments of some chapters. The Kent Law School, as part of the larger Centre for Law, Gender and Sexuality that spans the Universities of Keele, Kent and Westminster, kindly invited me to visit as well. I have benefited immensely from the many stimulating conversations I had with colleagues there: I would particularly like to thank Maria Drakopoulou, Davina Cooper, Emily Grabham and Stewart Motha in this regard.

Parts of the thesis have been presented at conferences and published before. An earlier version of chapter 2, which was written under Dr. Ratna Kapur’s guidance, was presented at the conference on “Postcolonialism, Sexuality and the Law”, that was organized by

My doctoral research was funded by the Indian Council of Historical Research: I was a Junior Research Fellow of the ICHR and their fellowship grant aided all material collection and research for two years. I am grateful to the staff at the Karnataka State Archives, Bangalore, where I have done much of the research for the Mysore history. They have been extremely co-operative; it was a pleasure to research at the archive there. I have been fortunate to have the love of very genuine friends, who have kept me sane and happy while writing the thesis: Manoj Tewari, Mohammad Gholam Umar, Dinesh, Haresh Pandey, Manish Sharma and Sushwi Sinha. Also, thanks to all the lovely girls in Ganga who made the last leg of my stay in JNU — days when I found myself falling in love with every red brick of this University that has given me so much — so pleasant.

I wrote the greater part of this work at home in Bangalore and it is with a lot of love that I acknowledge the contribution of my family. I could not have asked for a more conducive working environment. This thesis is for them, my mother, brother, sister, and my father who would have been very proud of it, with so much love.
