ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Rekindling of my passion for medical sociology in general and doctor nurse patient relationship in particular, is "an outcome of my association with several personalities" and names who stood by me in the hour of need and necessity.

Any work completed postulates an enviable background of collective effort and co-operation from diversified sources. The present dissertation absolutely undertakes this axiom in its sense and substance.

Even though there cannot be an end to the process of this acknowledgements. I find it essential and vital to mention that whatever I have achieved in educational career owes largely to the atmosphere my parents created in our family. My mother to whom I dedicate this thesis had to be hospitalised umpteen number of times for treatment both in govt. and private hospitals. My constant visits to her in these hospitals enabled me to have a microscopic look at all that goes on within it, thus inspiring me to take up this work as doctoral thesis in 1986. She unfortunately passed away in 1988. I do not want to undermine her spontaneous and imvaluable contribution by formally thanking her and my family. Their love and faith in me has not only helped me to overcome moments of despair and frustration but has been my source of strength.

Writing a dissertation has been a new experience in my academic career when I tend to consider with a feeling of relief that I succeeded at last in completing it. The topic I had chosen was a challenging task, the task I could not have completed without the support of my guide Dr. Dharam Vir Mahajan. I have been benefited much from the inspiration and encouragement, stimulating discussions, valuable advice, criticism and affection he bestowed on me throughout the period of the thesis work. I would have been handicapped by mere trivialities and the pleasure of research would have eluded me had it not been for him. Times without number I owe my gratitude for his valuable expertise.

It is my pleasure to express my deep sense of gratitude beyond expression and regard to Prof. R.S. Yadav who rendered the invaluable source in leading me through the unknown and difficult terrain of methodology and often taking stock of the completed drafts and shifting the proverbial grain from theacademic husk.

I am indebted to Dr. P.C. Sharma whose ungrudging support without any reservations in the schematisation of my dissertation, taught me the niceties of research work with affection and due consideration.

Infact the dissertation would have been wanting in its presentation had Mr. Devendra Singh not used his special secretarial skills while doing this work.

There are many other who assisted me in different ways by creating an atmosphere of co-operation and hope. My sincere thanks are due to each one of them.

Any research undertaking needs the crucial economic support and this came generously from ICSSR.

It is mandatory on my part to note the contribution of hospital authorities undertaken for study, N.A.S. College, Meerut University and Central University, Hyderabad in providing me with the information related to my work.

I will be failing in my duty if I do not thank all the respondents who have helped me in sustaining my interests in this effort.

To Madhusudan my husband I owe my very special appreciation for motivating me to undertake this research.
