ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In the writing of this dissertation, I have written on a page that has already been written on and spoken a language that has already been speaking. Many people and their thoughts and insights inform virtually every page of this study. It is impossible to thank all of them here. I will start by thanking my PhD supervisor Dr Prakash Kona at the English and Foreign Languages University (EFLU) for his invaluable intellectual and emotional support throughout this project. Prakash has been an embodiment of love and care for me and I can only repay him by trying to offer the same gifts to my own students. I would also like to thank Dr Rajiv C. Krishnan, member of my research advisory committee, for his help and encouragement. I also thank all my teachers, mentors, and interlocutors at EFLU for their support, guidance, and intellectual inspiration during the various phases of this project.

Needless to say, this dissertation would not have been a reality without the warm support and cooperation of many Mappilas I worked with during the intermittent field research for this project in today’s Malabar. In the interests of confidentiality, I cannot mention them by name, but I thank all of them from my heart of hearts and hope that their own ways of being and acting in the world are recreated in some measure in the following pages.

Preliminary drafts of much of this dissertation were written while I was a 2013-14 Fulbright-Nehru Doctoral Research Fellow at the Department of Anthropology at the University of California at Berkeley. Fulbright gave me the time, space, freedom and resources necessary to work on this project. I take the opportunity to thank both the Fulbright Board in Washington DC and the United-States India Educational Foundation in New Delhi for awarding me this prestigious fellowship. At UC Berkeley, I am most indebted to Charles Hirschkind, my Fulbright academic supervisor, for his guidance, love and care throughout my Fulbright tenure. He welcomed me to Berkeley with open arms and took special care to make me feel quite at home there. Charles also read parts of my draft dissertation chapters and offered insightful comments and suggestions—many a time over cups of coffee at Caffe Strada near the Kroeber Hall at Berkeley. I also thank Saba Mahmood for allowing me the pleasure of being part of her graduate and undergraduate seminars at Berkeley in fall 2013 and spring 2014 and of reading several important texts in the company of some wonderfully insightful minds. My thanks also go to other anthropology professors at Berkeley, most especially Lawrence Cohen and Stefania Pandolfo, for their friendship and intellectual companionship.

I have presented parts of this dissertation at seminars and conferences, including the “Histories of Histories” Graduate Student Workshop organized by the Centre for South Asia Studies, University of California at Berkeley in April 2014, the “Ways of Knowing” Graduate Student Conference on Religion held at the Divinity School, Harvard University in October 2013, and the Annual South Asia Graduate Student Conference on “The Self in South Asia” held at the University Of Chicago in April 2014. I am grateful to the organizers of these events for the opportunity to present my material in public. I also thank the audiences for their questions and comments.

A junior research fellowship (JRF) from the University Grants Commission (UGC) was also a great help in carrying out the research work leading to this dissertation. My thanks are also due to the UGC for this financial assistance.

This dissertation has immensely benefited from the close reading and critical engagement offered it by many scholars. Barbara Metcalf (University of California at Davis), Francis Robinson (Royal Holloway, University of London), Farina Mir (University of Michigan, Ann Arbor), and D. Venkat Rao (EFLU, Hyderabad) have all read parts of my dissertation chapters. I thank all of them for their incisive thoughts and suggestions.

Many libraries have helped this project to be what it is now. Apart from the Ramesh Mohan Library at EFLU, mention may be made of the marvelous libraries of the University of California at Berkeley, including Doe, Moffitt, the underground Gardner (Main) Stacks and Anthropology Library, and the Arabi Malayalam Research and Reference Library at the Mahakavi Moyinkutty Vaidyar Mappila Kala Akademi at Kondotty in Malappuram district of Kerala. I would like to thank the staff of these libraries for all their help and support.

I have learnt a lot from my friends and interlocutors at EFLU, Berkeley and beyond and I wish to thank all of them for their wisdom and insight. I also thankfully remember my alma mater Darul Huda Islamic University, Kerala, which gifted me the wings upon which I have allowed myself to soar.

Finally, my family has been a tremendous source of love, support and encouragement throughout this project. I thank my parents—my dearest Umma and Uppa—for everything. My siblings, Kunhimol and Kuttimon, have also been truly warm and supportive, as always. To Poovi, my soulmate, I owe a debt of gratitude for almost everything. I am grateful to my son Jugnu for always being there for me to feast my eyes upon him. To my entire family and to my close friends, the completion of this dissertation means that henceforth I can no longer cite my doctoral research as a reason for not being with them on important occasions as I did before.
A Note on Translation and Transliteration

All translations from Arabic, Arabi Malayalam, and Malayalam are mine, unless otherwise noted. It was not possible to include all original passages along with their translations, however. I cite original passages only when they are particularly important to my argument and closely analyzed.

Words from Arabic, Arabi Malayalam, and Malayalam follow standard systems of transliteration, with minor modifications which have been consistently maintained throughout.
