Acknowledgements

This thesis has taken a long time in the writing and as with any process of research and writing has incurred many debts along the way.

I will mention only a few here.

Lakshmi Lingam, my guide and Anjali Monteiro, my co-guide have been patient with my creative interpretation of deadlines and generous with their time and critical inputs. To them no thanks is enough.

Amit S. Rai read and extensively commented on my chapters. I am grateful to him for his impassioned engagement and for our wonderfully sustaining conversations.

Shilpa Ranade and Sameera Khan have been a source of strength when the going got tough and the sleep deprivation acute.

My colleagues, Anjali Monteiro, K.P. Jayasankar, K.V. Nagesh and P. Niranjana have been encouraging of my work and tolerant of my preoccupation during the writing phase of this thesis.

I would like to thank the women who spoke to me at length about their engagement with consumption and the pleasures of ‘malling’. Thanks are also due to various students and participants in workshops that I facilitated: a source of constant illumination on how young people think.

My parents, Shama and Suhas Phadke’s loving care of my daughter Aradhana (and me) made it possible for me to write in the last ten months. Without them this thesis would have never been completed.

Abhay Sardesai’s commitment to a life of the mind has always inspired me to be a better scholar. Thank you for demanding that I push the boundaries and for never telling me comfortable half-truths.

Aradhana Phadke Sardesai, my vocal ten-month-old is already aware that the computer is a rival for her mother’s attention. She is in turn entranced by its technological charms and resentful of its capacity to keep her mother chained to its side for long hours. Her presence in my life makes my intellectual quest ever more meaningful.
