So many people have helped me in so many ways in the writing of this dissertation that it is impossible to catalogue all my obligations. I shall therefore record here only the greatest of my debts.

It is to my teachers at the Jawaharlal Nehru University that I owe my abiding interest in history. My research supervisor, Dr. R. Champakalakshi guided my work always with warm encouragement and penetrating criticism for which I shall always be grateful. I owe to Professor Romila Thapar an almost equal debt for the patient hearing she unfailingly gave me, and for moulding, in many ways, my conceptions of history. Dr. Kadhavan Palat not only gave me helpful advice on academic matters but was also of great assistance in a whole range of non-academic issues. I also thank the Centre for Historical Studies at the JNU for having granted me a Junior Research Fellowship which allowed me to pursue my studies without worrying over much about the requirements of material existence.

It is impossible too to express in a sentence the ways in which Mukund Padmanabhan has shaped my views on the human condition in general, over the past seven years of 'spirited' discussions. It is also difficult to estimate my obligations to Paul Kurien and Amrita
Chachchi for the numerous arguments that we have had on the movement of history and the nature of man – not forgetting the number of times they fed me with huge quantities of good food. Bambi Sahai was so impossible that I mastered the fine art of being rude — but, I must record my gratitude to her for making life so much more enjoyable. My association with Sudarshan and Harsha Seneviratne was most beneficial – he was one of the few people here who could discuss medieval South Indian History with any knowledge and she had great culinary ability. And how can I but not acknowledge Peter DeSouza’s assistance in my research — by forcing me to listen to his constant tales of woe I developed great patience and forebearance.

I am also thankful to those who provided comic relief – Jyothi and Peppu, Binky and Ras, Bedi and Binita, Shyella and Ramdas. And I recall with gratitude Chetan Singh for the frequent use of his scooter.

I am greatly obligated to Mandhwani for deciphering my almost illegible scrawls in the process of typing this dissertation and to Chandrakanti Swain for drawing my maps. I remember with gratitude too the Library staff at the Jawaharlal Nehru University Library, the Central Archaeological Library, the National Museum
Library (all in New Delhi) and the University of Madras Library, Madras.

Need I add that none of the persons mentioned here are in any way responsible for any of the ideas expressed, or details mentioned, in this study as they may not believe a word of what I have written?
