Acknowledgements

Today, when I look back, the period of a little more than five years, which went into this thesis, seems to me to be the toughest and the most gratifying at the same time. It is impossible to explain this complex feeling in a few words. Almost each person who I got to interact with, however briefly, about my research, had either certain questions to ask, suggestions to make or at the very least, a remark or two on it. Most of them contributed to my thought process. Such have access to and adequacy of water become issues in the contemporary times! I do not claim to have brought out answers to all the problems concerned, but certainly I have tried to discuss the issues in such ways that it may allow us to gain better insights about the way we view the problems. This, I believe, will help us better formulate a more just solution to the issue of water.

This journey as a Ph.D. student will certainly have remained colourless or, to say even fruitless, without the contributions of some very notable persons. Before moving onto mentioning my teachers, friends and colleagues at JNU, I would like to thank the people I met during the fieldwork. Had it not been for their sincere attention and spirited participation as respondents, I would never have been able to bring out this thesis with the kind of details it now comprises of. I am greatly thankful to each one of them for their immense help and cooperation. I can only hope that my work brings out what is needed to do appropriate justice to the concerns and contexts of each of the respondents and similarly to everyone. Having said so, I do not really think I will be able to do justice to these millions of people for whom water is not just a commodity but a part of their daily struggle to survive.

I owe great regards to Prof. Niraja Gopal Jayal for being there for every help I needed. It is to her credit that she took due care to discuss with me my work at regular intervals. All these discussions especially remain in my remembering for the kind of sharp understandings and precise suggestions which she frequently used to draw and provide to me whenever we met for the purpose of assessment of my work. It was a pleasure and privilege to me for having gained from her vast experience and profound scholarship.
My association with Prof. Nandini Sundar has been especially enriching. Her enthusiasm for my work has remained undiminished ever since I approached her with my research idea in a rudimentary form. From the initial stage of synopsis writing till the day of submission she has been incisive and insightful right through. Her appropriate critical comments and crucial suggestions on my write-ups made me think, work and write better. Her patience towards delays on my part remains etched in my memories forever as a most accommodative gesture. All these years of being her student have made me closely experience her deeply caring mentoring interspersed with liberal showering of affection and needful dosages of scolding. To write that she even did a copy editing of my thesis is not at all an exaggeration. In the argumentation of this thesis I owe a lot to her.

Amongst other faculty members of my centre at JNU, I am especially thankful to Dr. Amit Prakash who helped me on innumerable occasions, especially regarding my stay in the campus. I am grateful to him for his constant support, stimulation and advice. I also wish to convey my sincere regards to my other teachers at CSLG, Dr. Jaiveer Singh and Dr. Jennifer Jalal whose precious help for the purposes of utilising field research techniques turned out to be very helpful. I want to convey my special thanks to Prof. Amita Singh, my M.Phil. supervisor at the Delhi University, with whom at JNU too I remained very close.

It is an appropriate space to mention the names of some very special friends and their special contributions to my student life at JNU due to which this research experience turned out to be a journey to remember. I start with my first intellectual mentor, Ganapathy, whose company taught me the basics of approaching to a doctoral research. Apart from this, I owe to him a lot in terms of friendship and inspiration. While in his company, his own doctoral research and thesis writing gave me my first look at all that is required in this endeavour. Bikash Da, not only happens to be a batch mate but also the one person from whom I got immense love and support during my pursuit. It was his big brotherly concern towards me which gave me my work space as he allowed me a complete free run to stay in his room for as long as I wanted. It can be only for a person like Sambit for whom I reserve words like ‘master of vocabulary’ and ‘artist who creates perfect expression’. It is to his credit that as and when I required that one friend to come to my rescue while facing a mental block during writing, Sambit was the one who would take away my worries and suggest to me much more than what I needed. I earnestly wish to see him finishing his thesis soon. Prabhat, the person with the most stinging and focussed remarks always kept his watchful eyes on me too, like on many other friends, so that we suffer with the minimum of deviations from our work. He too provided me with some very important readings, as a budding historian, which helped me steer carefully my arguments. Arvind, is the guy whom I will call the ‘man for every season’, the person with an undying spirit who always took care of every friend around him, one being me. Manish Sir remains to me that kind of friend who is a blend of so many qualities that I feel sometimes incompetent to find ways to return his affection in a befitting manner. His doctoral work, also on the issue of water, served as a precursor to mine. JP Sir is a person whom I could count on for anything/anytime. Someone, who to me resembles the exact meaning of the word ‘gentleman’. Mona’s company remains unforgettable too. Vinod, Manicandan and Guna are friends who always gave me the feeling of being special, loved, cared and important to them. Pandey, Vaibhav, Sushant, Vikas, Vikram, Shravan, Raja, Rafi, Ashutosh and Dhiraj are persons, times spent with whom will always remind me that days and times like these at JNU are to be cherished the most because never will they return.

The next set of friends share a common background with me of belonging to AISA, our students’ organisation. We all met during our association in AISA-JNU unit but along with hundreds of other comrades we sort of formed our own very special bonding: Mona, Mobeen, Tushar, Shephalika, Pallavi, Rajan, Chandan, Vincent, Meera, Pooja. It was not just their love, care and affection which I’ll keep in my heart forever but also the utmost sensitivity they had towards my research and the way they helped me overcome my low phases. I wish all of us grand success in our common dream for a world which sees the triumph of communism. The special bond which I shared with some more friends is also worth mentioning. These are some of those people whose memories can never be erased. Their wishes for my effort not just came in words alone but their worthwhile and wonderful company: Gurmeet, Harshita, Kriti, Uma, Vinay, Sumathi, Sanghamitra, Anindita and Mohita. I can vouch that this would have been very lonely crusade without the smiles and brightness which you people overwhelmed me with during the times when I needed them the most. Neighbours in the hostel like Brijesh, Mahalingam and Haokip will be thoroughly missed ahead in life. The penultimate list of mentions comprises of my gang_I call my ‘partners in crime’: Deva, Mishra, Niraj, Shailesh, Abdul, Sanjeev, Dharma, Naval, Adil, Nasir and Mohit. This sobriquet gels with the kind of fun we had during all kinds of times and turned each and every moment into a joie de vivre. Best of all, these ‘gangsters’, all mostly ‘junior’ to me, though merely in terms of their university batch, labelled their love by calling me ‘Aaloo Sir’, not to forget that ‘exalted status’ too, attached to it with regard to which I feel most humbled. During my final days of thesis writing they all helped me pull up my tired spirits by occasionally assembling at Sadiq Nagar, the haven granted to me courtesy Mishra ji who took minute care of my needs for which I’ll always be grateful to him.

I can’t forget to mention the name of Khanna Sir, our very own student friendly official in the administrative block of JNU, who always took utmost care in getting the fellowship remuneration disbursed as quickly as possible for all students at JNU. To me he will always remain the ideal administrative official. Apart from the intellectual appetite at JNU, there remain some people who took great care of my food and beverage related appetite without which it would have been impossible to sustain. Special mention needs to be made of Pramod, Yadav ji, Dahiya ji, Sanjay, Pravin and Vijay. They are not merely petty shop owners at JNU for me but rather some of those people who took true care of the students who are aiming for great heights. Without mentioning about their passionate style of mixing small livelihoods with quality care of students like us at JNU it is impossible to move ahead with our dissertations and theses. Similarly for newspaper vendor Maurya ji and the kiosk owner Bittoo at the famous Ganga Dhaba.

Ma and Papa, I tender a note of ‘sorry’ to you for all the forced absences from home, even though I was only a stone’s throw away, and for all the hassles you had to go through as I gradually became a son in absentia. It would be superfluous of me to cite your sacrifice, but I would be committing a grave mistake if I did not acknowledge it.
