ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Based on Mellor’s thesis of demand led growth, the research work undertaken here derives its context from the identification of forces of growth prevailing in a predominantly agricultural and developing economy. Employment in the non farm sector is broadly of two kinds- high productivity income opportunities and low productivity residual activities. Micro level analysis, at district level, is required to identify the dominantly active forces and to judge the desirability of structural shifts in the economy. Kheda district of Gujarat has been the subject of inquiry. In carrying out the above task of district level analysis, a number of people have inspired me and provided me with help.

Prof. SP Kashyap has been a source of advice, support and encouragement – both in my professional and academic endeavours. His deep knowledge and insight into the country’s development scenario as also his insistence on careful reading of the latest information base and data has given a definitive direction to this thesis. I would like to record my indebtedness to Prof. Kashyap, as a guide and a very senior colleague.

I also thank Prof. YK Alagh who has shown keen interest in my work and has always offered a lot of encouragement and support.

The faculty and staff of Sardar Patel Institute of Economic & Social Research (SPIESR) as well as my colleagues at Agro-Climatic Regional Planning Unit have provided an academically congenial and lively environment. Dr. SN Joshi and Prof. Rohit Desai were supportive and always prodded me on. Shailesh Dave offered computational assistance whenever I required it.

The secondary data analysed in this work has been sourced from various government reports and publications, individual research studies, books and monographs. The library staff of SPIESR have always been very cooperative and an enduring source of information.
My father, mother, mother-in-law and entire family have always encouraged me. My husband with his continuous involvement and silent encouragement has given me the resolve to undertake my academic pursuits. It is through my family’s unstinting support that this work has seen light of the day - I thank all of them. Although I did not fulfill my grandparents’ cherished desire of becoming a civil servant, I feel felicific in dedicating this work to the loving and respectful memory of Babaji and Ammaji.

Ahmedabad
May, 2001

Niti Mehta