Summoning the courage to register for a Ph.D. was not easy knowing that much of the time would be spent wondering if I could carry it through. As I suspected, this was a project that involved days of reading and re-reading a single article to get a grasp of how the author was speaking to my theoretical concerns. The dissertation involved months spent in the archives section, collating material only to realize later that most of it was marginal to my line of research. But most of all, simply figuring out how to escape the so-called Samuel Johnson conundrum of saying something original which was not good and writing something good that was not original took up most of my time.

Trusting that I have managed to say something vaguely original and modestly good, I would like to thank the people who made this possible.

This dissertation was goaded sometimes gently and at other times firmly by my distinguished supervisors, Ujjwal Kumar Singh and Ravi Sundaram. I may not have been admitted after my interview at the University of Delhi owing to the ironic lapse of leaving the address column blank in my application form. Had Ujjwal Kumar not noticed this in time, this dissertation may not have been written. From here on, he prompted me to simultaneously keep pace with the multiple administrative requirements of a Ph.D. in the University of Delhi along with the various academic developments in the field I was working on. At times, he suggested articles, at other times, he pointed out an empirical void in an argument I was making. He also painstakingly edited my chapters keeping an eye out for analytical misjudgment, incomplete thoughts and densely packed ideas. Thanks to him, I learnt the art of patience with concepts, facts, footnotes and the people I was interviewing. Most of all, he helped me resist the temptation of continuing to teach in a DU college – a timely intervention that helped me finish my Ph.D. within four and a half years.

Ravi Sundaram helped steer the course of this dissertation. He helped me plot this dissertation in terms of concepts, conjectures and material. Many of the insights and the arguments this dissertation has to offer are the result of Sundaram’s conscientious and patient reading of various drafts. He mapped out histories of ideas and pointed out stylistic errors. He showered books, articles and dissertations on me. He was immensely generous with his time and never grudged me a meeting even when he was weighed down by professional commitments. He chided and reproached me gently when he thought I was spinning conceptual redundancies and regurgitating arguments unthinkingly. He constantly inquired to note the progress of my dissertation. He opened up avenues for research in many places. He was instrumental in my figuring out how to make my material “take life” and yet not let it whirl out of control.

I must thank my supervisors for one other thing. When I had all but given up hope of finishing this dissertation owing to a debilitating illness that took one year of medicine, deep depression, physiotherapy and recovery, my supervisors were incredibly warm and supportive.

I am immensely grateful to my supervisor from my MPhil days at the University of Hyderabad, Sanjay Palshikar, who helped me bring out a dissertation which got me thinking about ideas of identification and documentary practices in the first place. His thoughtfulness, subtle intelligence, a sense of humour that caught you off guard and immense generosity continue to nourish all my intellectual projects.

My gratitude to my parents is beyond measure. I am simply amazed by their instinctive understanding of my need for academic space and opportunity. At the same time, they were able to mitigate my loneliness with frequent conversations and laughter. My father who helped go over this dissertation with a fine toothed comb cannot be thanked enough. I have always marveled at his academic career, which was marked by uncompromising altruism and high ethical standards as a teacher and administrator. My mother’s brave efforts during my dissertation to teach me how to read and write Tamil, a feat I didn’t quite master, were moments of pure joy. Our collective trip to the UK to spend time with my sister and her newborn son gave this dissertation a new lease of life.

I am also extremely grateful to Rama Mathew, Professor at the Education Department in Delhi University, who was my local guardian when I was staying in hostel. I can never forget her warm generosity, hospitality and immense patience with my nagging queries about hostel formalities. I deeply enjoyed my visits to her place and conversations with her husband, Iype Mathew and her prodigiously talented children, Tanya and Ranjan.

A note of thanks is in order to a few rigorous academics who wished this dissertation well, some of whom contributed many ideas to it. Aditya Nigam, Nivedita Menon, Awadhendra Sharan, Sarada Balagopalan, Radhika Singha, Pratiksha Baxi, Hilal Ahmad, P.K.Datta and Rajarshi Dasgupta were wonderfully helpful. I also owe so very much to a community of peer readers, serious researchers and friends like Shrimoyee Nandini Ghosh, Raghav Kishore, Santana Khanikar, Inderjit Kumar Jha, Jyoti Bhosale, Parvathi Ravindran, Bibek Bhattacharya, Anumitra Ghosh Dastidar, Pooja Satyogi, Praem Hidam, Saumya Premchandar, Anannya Baruah, Namrata Hasija, Nivedita Bhattacharjee, Indrajit Bachchal and Jeetu Basumatary.

It would be an unpardonable mistake to overlook the role of various institutions in shaping this project. First of all, thanks are due to the Centre for the Study of Developing Societies for giving me financial support over three years of my Ph.D. I was also delighted to work for a month in the British Library of London, an endeavour supported financially by the Charles Wallace Study Grant. I wish to thank Richard Alford for making my study trip go smoothly.

I extend many thanks to Jayashree Jayanthan, the administrator in CSDS as well as the people in the Accounts section. The non-teaching staff of the Political Science Department in DU were helpful. The various assistants at the National Archives of India were patient with my excessive queries. I would like to thank the helpful staff of Delhi State Archives, especially Sanjay Garg, who was extremely gracious with access to his computer. My many months of work in the Central Secretariat Library in Delhi were made possible by the staff there. I owe much to the lovely research assistants at Teen Murti Library, especially those in the newspaper archives section. I also gratefully acknowledge the help rendered by the staff at Parliament Library, Ratan Tata Library and CSDS Library, places I spent considerable time in. I am also deeply grateful to the people at the English and Foreign Languages University (EFLU), Hyderabad, or formerly CIEFL, for letting me use their library at leisure.
Where my field work goes, I simply cannot find space here to thank all the gracious and hospitable individuals that propelled my research. Naming a few select individuals will have to suffice. Mukhiya, D’Souza, Karnail Chand, L.D.Pahwa, Shailesh, Osman Ali, Jai Bhagwan Jatav, Sohanlal Sharma, Khataria, R.L.Kain and Ramesh were simply remarkable persons in their intelligence and the worldviews they held. I dedicate this dissertation to the numerous intelligent residents of the Govindpuri slum cluster where I did my field study.

I owe so very much to certain wonderful people who work at my parents’ and husband’s home in Hyderabad and Delhi respectively. Lakshmi and Renuka who cleaned our house in Hyderabad, Kavitha aunty, Raju, Renu and Jayanthi who helped in our Delhi residence were the silent forces behind this dissertation.

And finally, I am engulfed everyday by the love, affection, patience and spontaneity of my husband and my best friend, Gopal Sathe. Through my bouts of bad health, a vicious dog bite, (the dog was his!) job paranoia, political rage and superstitious beliefs, he stood by me, firm as a rock. His effervescence, pop culture geekiness and erudition were both exhausting and rejuvenating. He lit up every dull day of fretting over my work. My warm thanks are due to my parents-law, my husband’s uncle and aunt and his grandmother for their material and moral support and their kindness in the last stages of my dissertation. Our handsome, temperamental and mental Labrador Bingo shook things up considerably – walks with him were memorably fun days during the dissertation.
