ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The investigator wishes to thank Professor P.H. Prabhu for supervising this research and for offering his criticisms and suggestions during the preparation of this report. The present form of the dissertation owes much to his interest and help. The investigator also wishes to thank Profess S.K. Mitra, under whom the study was first designed and who painstakingly introduced the investigator to the clinical method; Kanwal Mehra, who guided the work for a stretch of time; H. Philipson, Pranab Mitra and Erik H. Erikson, and others who helped in various capacities are Messrs. M.M. Trivedi, B.B. Siddiqui, Sajni Karna, Sybil David, Kheali Nandi and N. Barodia. Two UNESCO studies employed some of the instruments developed by this study and provided valuable data on their reliability and validity.

A fellowship awarded by the B.M. Institute, Ahmedabad, helped the investigator to initiate work on this study. The Institute also provided him with varied clinical experience without which the study could not have taken the shape it took. A scholarship from the University Grants Commission facilitated the completion of this research and the preparation of this report.

DELHI, 1967. Ashis Nandy
"Money!" he said. "Money is a sort of instinct. It's a sort of property of nature in man ... It's nothing you do. It's no trick you play. It's a sort of permanent accident of your nature ..."

Greeks and Romans worshipped a god of Money, Harmes. ... He is now the only god who still gives active proof of his omnipresence: changing shape continually; scattering rewards or punishments in this world rather than the problematic next; ... and wielding universal power.
