ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The present research was rather ambitious for it sought to study the foreign students on the rolls of the very many colleges and universities spread all across a big country like India. One estimate puts the number of foreign sojourners on academic pursuit in this country at about 25000. But of course the task was not easy. However the perpetual encouragement and pains-taking guidance of Prof. Noor Mohammad saw me through to the very end. His help was extensive and always available. I am full of gratitude to him for his reassuring supervision, and deeply acknowledge my indebtedness.

I am also thankful to the members of the department of Sociology at Aligarh Muslim University for their kindness and help and must in particular mention Dr. M. B. Mathur.

Of course the respondents who numbered more than the 500 actually treated in this thesis, were the people most ready and forthcoming with answers as well as moral support. Their encouraging response to my questionnaire kept the research in progress.

I must also thank the ICSSR, and the Department of Sociology, Poona especially Prof. D. N. Dhanagare, and the staff of the libraries at Delhi and those elsewhere in India, for their kind cooperation and assistance.

Friends outside India were also of great help and I must particularly mention my parents, brothers and sisters individually for the emotional and monetary sustenance which prodded me to prolong my stay in India, and saw to it that the work I had on hand must be happily concluded.
