For carrying out the research and preparing this dissertation, I have become obliged to an embarrassingly large number of individuals (including friends and family members), not all of whom can be mentioned here – for which, space constraint is not the only reason. I wish I could cite all 115 respondents of my field survey, all 6 senior KM professionals whose expert insights went into questionnaire design and testing, all key resource persons from 4 case firms who gave their feedback for the validation of the framework developed by me. But most of these persons wished to remain anonymous. So while honouring their desire of anonymity, I only wish to express my gratitude to ‘all those people out there in the field’. Without their help, this research would not have been of practical utility. I would however like to take out just one person from this sea of anonymity for my special thanks. The suggestions and feedback given by Dr. S. Chandrasekhar, Chair Professor (IT) from FORE School of Management were really invaluable for questionnaire design.

For getting conceptual and academic guidance for this research, I was rather fortunate at many levels. From AMU, apart from my internal advisor, I had the benefit of personal encouragement and insights from Prof. S. M. Ozair, Dean, Faculty of Management Studies & Research and Prof. Kaleem M. Khan, former Dean, during my one-to-one discussions on the topic. Dr. Salma Ahmed, my internal advisor from AMU was of course, a constant source of encouragement and support during the entire period of my research. Earlier from AIMA, Dr. Vigya Garg’s comments were of valuable help at the synopsis stage.

The other pillar of my strength was my external advisor, Dr. M. L. Singla from Faculty of Management Studies, University of Delhi. He had set a high benchmark before me to achieve – in terms of research quality as well as the speed. I hope you’re not disappointed, Dr. Singla!

At the family front, praise and thanks go to my wife Sushma for bearing my mood-swings during the high-pressure days of my research and proving to be a true companion – a knowledgeable one at that! And finally for inspiration to pursue higher education and for what I’m today, I thank my parents Raj Kumari and Bansi Lal Arora.
