This work would not have seen the light of day had it not been for the support of a few people. My guide, mentor and friend, Shubhada Maitra for believing in my work and giving me the space to explore my relationship with academic writing. Dr. Nandini Manjrekar and Professor U Vindhya for painstakingly engaging with my thought and writing and pointing me towards new material, new theoretical visions, with which to view my data. Dr. Asha Achuthan, who would often listen to my thoughts and translate these into reference lists for me to look up in the library or on the net. Thank you all.

Thanks to Professor Surinder Jaswal and Dr. Bindhulakshmi P. for your inputs as discussants during my proposal and synopsis presentations. While being one time inputs, your engagement with my material provided me with great insights to take this work forward.

Many thanks to all my study participants for reflecting on and sharing your life journeys with me. Your stories have not just helped to produce this work, but have provided insights that guide all my work - service provision, teaching or advocacy.

LABIA, a collective that has come to mean so many things in the past few years in my personal and political life. I cannot imagine this work to be what it is without the many conversations with all of you during our meetings, campaigns, innumerable sutta breaks and drinking sessions. Here’s to us!

Finally to all the people, who have been friends, companions, community not just through the journey of this thesis but in life, who make life a bit more easy, who have meant home and comfort and who have tolerated all my idiosyncrasies and anxieties and have just been there for me – to seema, roopa, sharmaji, reva, asha, albert – thanks so much for all that you bring to my life.
