Doing a Ph.D. study is akin to flying high and flying alone, but what appears like flying alone is made possible by numerous people, who form the all essential wind beneath the wings. Dr. Lata Narayan, my research guide, kept me from losing my way in the jumble of ideas and straightened out my really complex sentences. Without her keen observations and erudite suggestions, the present work would have lacked its clarity and readability. Thank you Ma’am for being such a kind, understanding and sensitive research guide and for letting me fly without any anxiety.

Tim Berners-Lee, thank you for inventing the World Wide Web, a single invention that created a huge difference in the lives of all knowledge workers. Prof. Michael Ungar contributed by sending me the Child and Youth Resilience Measure and by always replying to my queries, thank you sir for your time and for sharing your knowledge with me so willingly.

Laxmi Kant Dwivedi was my statistical encyclopaedia, who always encouraged me to go beyond the obvious and clarified my myriad doubts unfailingly, thank you sir, for being so approachable and humble. The statistical analyses used in this study would have been just an ambition without your help. I thank Prof. Yesudian for helping me contact you. I also thank Prof. Parasuraman, for being the most non-threatening head of an institution, sir you command the respect that comes not out of fear but out of genuine appreciation. Thank you Bala sir and Manju ma’am for taking care of the administrative requirements.

Conducting a study in Kashmir, living in Baramulla and Bandipore would have been, not just impossible but unsafe without all the wonderful people I met and took refuge with. Ambreen, chachi, abba and Adil, thank you for hosting me like a daughter and for encouraging me to keep my spirits high and achieve my goals during one of the most difficult phases of my otherwise uneventful life. Muzamil and her loving family have made me feel like a kin, and their affection and dua are most precious to me. Tareek sir’s insightful discussions, especially when I was confused about my sampling technique, helped me overcome that hurdle, thank you sir for your concern. Javed Ahmed Mir and his family hosted me in Bandipore with a lot of care and affection, and I thank him for helping me contact the schools in Bandipore. It was a treat to talk to his octogenarian father who introduced me to the Bandipore before violence. Bashir Ahmed Mir from the Human Aid Society, was again a great source of help and support, it was through his reference that I could live in Javed saab’s home despite being a complete stranger and it is also because of his contacts that I could access some far-flung schools in Uri.

Khurram was someone who actually made me understand the passion behind the ideology of Azadi. The long discussions with him widened my perspective and enriched my understanding of youth in Kashmir, thanks for all your contacts and for answering all my naïve questions about your experiences and beliefs. Ashfaq Mallik painstakingly translated all my questionnaires into Urdu and Mudasir translated them back to English, their suggestions and involvement with the endeavour was extremely helpful. Thanks Sameer Ashraf, for sharing your painting and your experiences of growing up in Kashmir with me, it was a treat to talk to someone so young, sensitive and creative.

Sheikh Junaid (who was the SSP in Baramulla then) and his officers are specially thanked for making the elusive data on violence available, without which my sampling technique was ready to fall on its face. Mr. Dar’s (Secretary in the Directorate of Education, Srinagar) letter of introduction eased my way into the schools all over Bandipore and Uri, thank you sir for encouraging and supporting research. The schools and teachers from where I collected data were very helpful and went out of their way to make me feel comfortable, thank you all. Thank you Bashir Gowhar saab and all the teachers at the school in Wagoob, I will never forget the home cooked food in the month of Ramadan that was especially made for me.

I remember the two nameless people who drove their bus from Uri to Baramulla just to drop me off safely, in a cold winter evening, even though I was the only passenger and it was not even their route, thank you for believing that I was indeed a stranded research scholar, I hope you never lose your trusting nature. I thank all those lovely Kashmiri families who fed me at various points in time, your hospitality is unsurpassed.

The fifth floor in the Ph.D hostel at TISS has been my haven for the last five years, and it is the people who lived here who made all the difference. Milly, Nandini, Rama, Susan, Vaithegi, Ciara, Mamtha and Kamlesh are those lovely ladies who made hostel life wonderful. Some relationships have a Karmic connection and I firmly believe that I have made two such karmic friends – Borsha and Sayantini, it’s funny to thank you for the great times and the easy camaraderie. Thanks for your patience BD, you really made life livelier and thanks SG, not just for the staples but also for being the support right across the door. I would like to thank the non-resident scholars, Lata for leading me to the Bhagwad Gita classes and for your kindness, Joyeeta, for your belief in me and your optimism, Premlatha, Pragya, Ashima and Sayani for their love and support. Thank you Justin for reading the dissertation and your suggestions.

I never imagined that studying the topic would end up being a test of my own resilience, I thank Manish for the great times and for showing me how inseparably intertwined resilience and vulnerability are. Button-nose and Rabbit-tooth are remembered fondly for letting me boss over them and also for making me feel so responsible and yes, for loving me back in return! I thank didi and Rajkishoreda for making every crisis seem manageable and for always wanting the best for me.

Finally, I thank all my young respondents for their time and enthusiasm.

With so many people being the wind beneath my wings, no wonder I got to touch the skies!
