This research was carried out over a period of nearly six and a half years. Between 2008 and 2010, I was awarded a Teacher Fellowship under the UGC-FIP scheme which made it possible to take time off from regular duty hours. I am obliged to respective administrative authorities in the Kolkata UGC office as well as those in my workplace, Sree Chaitanya College, for providing the paid leave at a crucial stage of my research.

Professor Nilanjana Gupta, under whose supervision the research was carried out, allowed complete freedom and provided constant support and encouragement. I can hardly exaggerate the value of her suggestions at every stage that helped in deciding the scope and direction of this research. I have always benefited from her commentaries on drafts of every chapter and the discussions that we have had.

I am particularly thankful to Professor Amlan Dasgupta, who was ever obliging to go through the drafts whenever I asked for his time and offer his comments. Professor Sibaji Bandyopadhyay, apart from being an inspiration for any young researcher working in the area of children’s books, provided detailed comments and pointed out references that I was not aware of. I have also benefited from discussions with Dr. Moinak Biswas on a number of occasions.

The dissertation in its present form also owes a lot to interactions with Professor Parimal Ghosh, (late) Dhruba Gupta, Rajarshi Dasgupta, Prashanta Chakravarty, Shrimoy Roy Chowdhury, Debraj Bhattacharya, Mollica Dastidar, Varuni Bhatia, Sharmadip Basu, Tapati Chowdhury and Bodhisattva Kar. Debasmita Bhattacharya has often helped me with writing lengthy transcripts of interviews. Although many of these interactions were not always or strictly academic, friends have stood for more than they knew. Thanks are also due to Nandini Chandra who kindly agreed to let me have a look at her M. Phil dissertation on Amar Chitra Katha submitted in J.N.U., New Delhi. The personnel in the Visual Archive of CSSS, Kolkata, allowed me to have a look at the material, such as 19th and early 20th century popular prints and Bengali advertisements, stored in their collections.

Kaustuv, Sunando and Sucharita have provided enjoyable company and hospitality during my two field trips to Mumbai as did Debraj, Amrita and Rajarshi during a similar trip to Delhi. (Late) Mr. Anant Pai, the erstwhile chief editor of Amar Chitra Katha, provided every help that I asked for in the Mumbai office of Amar Chitra Katha, apart from agreeing to give lengthy interviews when he patiently listened to every question and answered them in detail. Thanks are due for the same reason to scriptwriters, editors, illustrators and managerial heads associated with the product, namely Subba Rao, Luis Fernandez, Yagya Sharma, Margie Shastry, (late) Ram Waeerkar, Dilip Kadam and Sameer Patil. In Delhi, Naveen Menon of Children’s Book Trust, Bunny Kurien and Manas Mahapatra of National Book Trust, and Sanjay Gupta of Raj Comics had taken time out of their busy office schedule for recorded interviews. Although he did not agree to be recorded on tape, Gulshan Rai of Diamond Comics obliged with an informal conversation.
Prashanto Paul, Biswanath Ghatak, Sukanto and Arun Ghosh informed me on various historical and technical details of four-color printing technology. I should admit that I have only begun to learn about the role played by printing technology (and the technical hands where older manual printing survives) in determining the fate of popular literature as literary and trade category. Staff of the Department of Printing Technology, Jadavpur University (Salt Lake Campus), provided me with the facility of using necessary instruments in the departmental lab for measuring the samples that I supplied and also answered my queries. It would not have been possible to furnish the details regarding the quality of paper presented in a table appearing towards the end of the first chapter without their help.

Finally, Ma, Baba and Mama have always provided invaluable support and encouragement that words alone cannot do justice to.
