ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Writing the acknowledgement has been an eagerly awaited task. Not only because it signaled the end of this long, arduous work. But as much for the opportunity it provides to finally thank all the people who have made possible what seemed impossible at several points of time. Reading, comprehending and structuring the ideas, concepts and information one had collected, and writing it has been several opposing things at the same time – extremely challenging, stimulating and exciting, yet also frustrating and full of despair. It is only because of the support and encouragement of a large family of relatives, friends, teachers, and well-wishers that it could be completed.

A lot is due to my supervisor, Dr Imrana Qadeer. My heartfelt and affectionate thanks to her for many things. For painstakingly going through several drafts and bringing order into the chaos that was the first draft that I handed to her. With her vast knowledge and critical insights, she has helped to not just conceptualize and articulate this thesis, but also the ideas with which one came into public health from the field of biology. She provided a wealth of information and meticulous suggestions; any gaps and errors in the work would be only due to my limitations in not being able to incorporate them.

It would be unjust to acknowledge only her academic guidance and inputs. Dr Imrana has not let her age come in the way of our comradeship. Her energy and enthusiasm towards my topic have kept up sagging spirits. Despite her own numerous academic and family commitments, she has been extremely supportive and shown patience and empathy, not only as women often do especially with other women trying to strike a balance between the domestic and the public spheres of our work. She has also extended support and encouragement in several other issues one cannot but get involved in, in these times of utmost exploitation, injustice and bigotry. A crucial issue has been that of work around the arrest and continued detention of an important public health practitioner of our times, Dr Binayak Sen in Chhattisgarh. Binayak’s work, as also Imranadi’s participation in the struggle for his release, is a great teaching experience and inspiration to the younger lot like us. Thanks to Imranadi, Dunu and their family, for their hospitality, lunches and coffee, and bearing with my presence in their house for long periods over the last two months. My apologies too for not abiding by the deadlines we had set for the completion of this thesis.

I also thank Dr K R Nayar for gently reminding me about some official procedures, consenting to be my co-supervisor, and going through the chapters and offering useful suggestions. Thanks to Dr Rajib Dasgupta, Dr Rama Banu, and Dr Sanghamitra Acharya. They have helped at various times by helping to get books and papers from the CSMCHM Documentation Centre, as also with friendly advice. I extend my thanks to Dr Kasturi Sen, for making arrangements so that I could access the University of Cambridge library, Cambridge, during March-September 2002. It would have been impossible without her support.
I am extremely grateful to Dr Mathew Vergese of St Stephen's Hospital, Dr Samiran Nundy and Dr K.C. Mahajan, then at Sir GangaRam Hospital, Dr L.R. Murmu of AIIMS, and Dr Murthy then at RML Hospital, all in Delhi, for taking time off from their hectic hospital schedules for valuable discussions and insights on status of medical equipment in hospitals, and feasibility of a hospital study relating to medical technology.

A young friend, Ranjana Guha, needs to be acknowledged for her assistance in understanding information put out by the Ministry of Statistical Planning and Implementation (MOSPI). Thanks are also due to the staff of the Documentation Unit of CSIC and Center for Studies in Science Policy, and some of the staff at the Central Library, JNUI, for helping locate journals and books within and outside JNUI.

My parents, especially my mother, have reposed tremendous faith and confidence in me and my abilities, in spite of what was looked upon as my rather wayward behaviour. I hope with this fulfillment of a long-cherished dream of theirs I have brought some happiness to them in their old age. My siblings and their respective spouses too have been very supportive and understanding in their own ways. My mother-in-law’s support on the domestic front, especially during the five months of coping with a painful fracture of the right wrist, has been crucial to the completion of this work and several other commitments. With her lieutenant Madhu she ensures that that the family is well-fed at all times.

I owe much to all my comrades and friends, for their intellectual camaraderie and for simply being there. Sudha’s friendship is invaluable, and a tremendous source of inspiration. It is also the much-needed window in our academic pursuits to the world of realpolitik. My young friends Priyanka, Dipankar and Poonam have been extremely forthcoming with dispatching books and papers. Basant’s advice to maintain notes of everything that I read is invaluable. Smita, Sharmistha, Raghu, Madhavi, Guhan, and Praveen, have all stood by me through all the pleasures and difficulties of family life—bringing up children-urban living, etc. I am thankful to Abhay, Rakhal, and Sathyamala, for several discussions, and providing the opportunity of some ‘lived experience’ of public health. Thanks to Usha Aravamutham for coming into my life with her perseverance and zest. A big thanks to KY and Devapriya, for bearing with my angst, and all the friendly and some not-so-friendly discussions; and for access to their offices and the ICTs at their disposal. Finally – a great hug and applause to my daughters Mini and Anandi - for their immense patience and co-operation stretching far beyond their young years, curiosity about life in general, and especially about this ‘PhD’, and what I was going to do after a ‘PhD’. Thanks to little Anandi for offering to type the chapters and format them, and her wonderful stories and chatter; and to Mini for cheering me up with her music, and making me listen to The Piano Man and several other songs.
