I owe a deep debt of gratitude to a number of people who were instrumental in facilitating this study. I thank my Supervisor, Dr. Praveen Jha, for his support and guidance. I am deeply grateful to Mahesh Rangarajan for his incisive analytical inputs and constant encouragement. I also thank Dr. Vikas Rawal of CESP for guidance with data analysis.

The people of the villages displaced from Kuno wildlife sanctuary shared their lives, experiences and affection unstintingly with me, and I am deeply grateful to them. The entire team at Samrakshan Trust, especially its Madhya Pradesh Field Office, deserve a heartfelt vote of thanks for hosting me during the field work and helping to ease the difficult ground conditions. Ramlal Ravaria, Dayakishan Kushwah, Rajesh Kushwah and Roshan Mangal spent long hours in the villages, cheerfully helping me with fieldwork, provided I kept up a steady supply of bidi and pan masala. Without their deep insights into the area and people, arising partly from having faced the challenges of displacement in their own lives, this study would have had been far less detailed and nuanced. I am especially grateful to Ramlal Ravaria for his patience in fielding an endless stream of questions on diverse aspects of the Sahariya life, livelihood, culture and traditions. I also thank Ganesh Naik, who helped to conduct Participatory Appraisals with members of women’s Self Help Groups in the displaced villages.

My parents and friends deserve a huge vote of thanks for their support and encouragement. I thank Suman, Shankar and Alpana for incessant cups of tea and lots of good cheer. My greatest debt of gratitude is to three persons without whom I cannot contemplate having done this work – firstly, Arpan Sharma, who introduced me to the people and forests of Kuno, was instrumental in getting me to start this study, and chipped in with critical inputs whenever required. Arnab Mukherji was a constant source of support, good cheer, and help in designing and structuring the study. And finally, Syed Merajuddin’s contribution to this work was invaluable; his encouragement, support, insights and analytical contributions were critical for my work. However, the responsibility for any errors and gaps that may remain in this study is mine alone.

Sikander the tomcat provided comic relief and hours of comfort purring in my lap as I toiled away at my computer. Unfortunately, he died a few days before completion of this thesis, leaving behind a host of memories and a void that nothing seems to fill. It is to his memory that this work is dedicated.
