This thesis is a product of my stay in India for 5 years. When I started my involvement in the academic work of south Asian studies, I had never imagined writing my thesis both in an alien country and an alien language. Even when my Ph.D. Programme has started at the Jawaharlal Nehru University in January 2003, I was aware of the fact that the goal of completing thesis was far away. Therefore I am deeply pleased to be able to submit this thesis to the university. During the writing of this thesis, I incurred many academic debts. I wish to take this opportunity to thank all those who helped me.

Professor Bhagwan Josh, my supervisor, first took a role of gateway to India through his wife, Dr. Shashi Joshi, who also has given me sustainable and warm support since we met for the first time in Tokyo. Professor Josh, despite my initial difficulty in communication in English, continued to encourage my study. His critical and invaluable comments especially in theoretical issues always guided my study in right direction. I am also deeply indebted to my former supervisor Professor Majid Siddiqi, whose book Agrarian Unrest in North India was a first introduction to the study of Indian peasant movements when I was writing a dissertation for my undergraduate degree in Japan almost a decade ago. Without his patient and continuous guidance even after his retirement, I could not have completed this thesis. My acknowledgement also goes to Naz, his wife, whose hospitality, along with that of Professor Siddiqi, with her tasteful dishes was great memory for me and my wife. Thus I was in a very fortunate position in India to have two valuable supervisors to guide my research work.

This doctoral research was conducted under the Indo-Japan Cultural Exchange Programme sponsored by the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR). I am honoured to be a scholarship holder of the Government of India and its prolonged support of 5 years is gratefully acknowledged. I have worked at a number of libraries and archives in India. These include National Archives of India (Delhi), Nehru Memorial Museum & Library (Delhi), Jawaharlal Nehru University Library (Delhi), Uttar Pradesh State Archives (Lucknow), Uttar Pradesh Regional Archives (Allahabad and Varanasi), Gorakhpur Commissioner's Office, Bihar State Archives (Patna), and West Bengal State Archives (Kolkata). V. V. Giri Institute of Development Studies (Lucknow), A. N. Sinha Institute of Social Studies, and G. B. Pant Social Science Institute (Allahabad) also allowed me to use their facilities during these archival researches. I wish to express my gratitude to the staff of all these institutions for their kind help and cooperation.

In Japan, many professors laid the foundation for my Ph.D. project in India. Among them was Professor Heiji Nakamura, who first took me to the world of dynamic political history of modern and the contemporary India. He repeatedly told me of the attraction of studying in India from his experience of 40 years ago. Professor Masao Naito always tried to understand what I wanted to do in my study and gave me very helpful comments to improve it. Critical and precious comments from, and discussions with many other scholars are also greatly appreciated. Furthermore, I would like to thank my friends in India and Japan for assisting and cheering up me.

Last but not the least, I have to thank my wife, Chinami Lee, who specializes in Korean history of the colonial period. We sometimes had good discussions regarding the issues on colonialism in both the countries. But my gratitude is due especially to her great generosity and patience to allow me to leave her alone in Tokyo for such a long period even after we got married in 2005.
