ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The conclusion of this thesis is the end of four and a half years of the most challenging and extremely difficult phase of my life, which would not have culminated with the successful completion of this thesis, had it not been the constant support and encouragement of a few people. It is therefore a pleasant task to express my heartfelt gratitude to all those who contributed in many ways to the success of this study.

First and foremost, I would express my heartfelt gratitude to my Supervisor, Prof. Ravi S. Srivastava for giving me an opportunity to work under his distinguished guidance. Undoubtedly, no encomiums would be high to acknowledge his immense academic support at every step from the formulation of the synopsis to the finalization of the thesis. There is not an iota of exaggeration when I vouch that a holistic and in-depth study of the subject would not have been possible, if not for him and his meticulous analysis, incisive and thought-provoking comments and inexhaustible levels of patience to read what seemed my forever-unfinished voluminous drafts. Infact, a few lines are too short to express my immense admiration for his efforts despite his excruciating work pressure.

I also take this opportunity to acknowledge with fond memories the efforts of Dr. M. Kabir, Centre for Development Studies, Kerala University for his selfless assistance in enlightening me with an extensive account of nature of food-deficit and its repercussions on the life of Keralites in the 60s and the 70s. I am also indebted to Shri S.M. Vijayanandan, IAS, Principal Secretary, Local Self Govt. Deptt., Govt. of Kerala, without whose help I would not have been able to gain information from important government documents and research materials from Public Offices in Kerala.

I also put on record my appreciation for the respondents of the Primary Survey, whose generosity to share their time and their valuable inputs, went a long way in clear understanding of the problems at the grassroots level. This was the part, I was most apprehensive and unsure to start with. But the warmth and comfort provided to me, a Non-resident Keralite by the natives of the state, made me confident, resulting in obtaining a sea of valuable information from them.

I would also like to extend my regards to all the people in various Public Offices of Kerala, who despite my best efforts to explain the genuineness of work at hand, were nonchalant backed by their know-all perception about research works as being of no particular use to them or to the society apart from conferring a degree on the researcher. The insurmountable difficulties encountered in the collection of data from secondary sources, while giving me many sleepless nights, helped me evolve as a stronger individual to face even greater adversities of life.

This thesis would not have survived some of the trying times if it had not been the unquestioning support of my brother and my parents. I wonder what my life would have become if I did not have the three of them in my life. My brother, who has been my greatest pillar of strength, for being exceptionally supportive and patient throughout my life without ever questioning my choices, for standing behind me and reinforcing my spirits at all crucial junctures, for constantly encouraging and selflessly helping me, for striving and working for my success often at the cost of his own life. I thank him from the bottom of my heart. It's a great feeling that I have someone to turn to, in the most difficult of times. He is the most valuable person in my life and I would not have reached where I am today without his active support. Pappa, for his dreams of seeing me with a 'Dr' prefixed to my name, much before I contemplated about the direction of my academic life, for his constant presence and support not only during the entire field-work and subsequent data gathering process but also throughout my life. Amma, for constantly encouraging me to touch the highest peaks of academic excellence & doing everything possible to ensure that there are no roadblocks in my way, taking care of me all my life despite her weak health, listening to everything that I had to say all the time, soothing me when I was nearing a tearful breakdown, and selflessly standing by my side regardless of what everybody thought. I thank them for their unwavering faith in me. I dedicate this work to the three of them to honor their love, concern and support in this difficult journey and throughout my life.

The greater part of my data collection was in Thiruvananthapuram, which concluded without much difficulty, owing to the background work and help provided by my in-laws, who are indeed my second parents. It is truly a blessing to have them in my life. From planning my field trips, accompanying me to all places, arranging meetings with concerned officials, collecting and sending me all materials that they thought was remotely related to the study, to actually making innumerable trips to Public Offices for data collection, their immense contribution in this work cannot be penned into words. A special thanks to them for their love and support from the time they entered my life.

One of the best experiences in this difficult journey was the birth of my daughter. She has provided an additional joyful dimension to my life. I truly hope every success of mine will have a positive impact on her life.

Staying outside the campus would have made it difficult, had it not been the support and immense help provided by my friends, Kannan and Sridhar. My special thanks to them for helping me in every way they could.

To everyone, who kept asking me all these years: "Have you not finished your thesis yet?" Silencing that question was a prime motivation, when life's other intellectual enticements kept singing to me…

And to everyone else, who have been of help to me directly or indirectly in this study and who, owing to my preoccupations at this important hour, have missed my attention.......
