ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My family friend Shri. S. M. Kelkar suggested this neglected topic in rural sociology of India to me. He was a retired Planning Commission officer who, in his student days, had carried out a field survey in 1954-55, of Balutedars in 26 villages of western Maharashtra to study their employment and earnings. He further offered his field and other notes, for any use that I could make of them. I have used some of his data, which I could retrieve, from his old files. I am grateful to him for this help he gave me.

My research guide, Prof. U. B. Bhoite gave me full freedom to work on the topic under him. I have taken a lot of time to progress in this uncharted field, collecting snippets of information in the vast literature of censuses, gazetteers, books and journal articles. While his paternal chiding to expedite the work has energized me, I remain forever grateful to him for the infinite patience he has shown towards me and the interest he has show in my work. I thank him wholeheartedly.

Since this dissertation is entirely a library product, I could not have progressed in my work without the co-operation of the librarians and the library staff. I extend my wholehearted thanks to the librarian and the staff of D.R. Gadgil Library of the Servants of India Society, Pune. I also thank the Librarians of the Deccan College Post-Graduate Research Institute, Pune, and Bhart Itihas Sanshodhak Mandal, Pune.

I also thank Prof. V.S. Chitre, Director, Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, Pune, for permitting me to study and copy some data from the unpublished village survey reports.

I remain forever grateful to the members of my family, who not only relieved me from routine household chores, but also positively encouraged me. My father not only encouraged me but also helped me financially all through. To express my thanks to him as also to other members of my family would be too formal indeed.

I must not forget to mention my thanks to Shri. V.N. Inamdar, who manually typed the first four chapters. Later he helplessly discontinued on account of his ill health. Typing of the remaining chapters as also retyping of the earlier chapters on the computer was undertaken by my younger brother and sister. My special thanks are due to them. I also thank M/s Maharashtra Computer Applications for the excellent job they have done in bringing out this dissertation for presentation.
