Preface

The biggest challenge in front of any scholar of social science is to maintain the balance between facts and values. As put by Anthropologist Malinowsky, the researcher should approach his study with a blank mind but this is easier said than done. In the process of research the innumerable facts themselves may disorient a researcher from the scope and theme of study. When this happens the hypothesis formulated in the mind of the researcher helps him remain on course. In spite of all effort the theme of the research is influenced by the values imbibed by the researcher. I do not deny that in this study, this might not have happened. However, I feel satisfied that I have been able to make an addition to the vast treasure of knowledge that already exist. This is but a drop in the ocean.

In completion of this study I do not have enough words to express my gratitude and thanks to my respected supervisor Dr. Tulsi Ram without whose support, inputs and understanding this study would have never taken shape. My gratitude also goes to my wife Sunita, who first of all agreed to a difficult task of being my typist. Secondly, she patiently and painstakingly bore with all my idiosyncrasies and frequent and innumerable amendments. My thanks also goes to my sister Saumya who has helped me from the very start of my research. My gratitude also goes to my elders particularly Nanaji, Mummy, Papa without whose blessings I would be incapable of doing anything. My thanks also to all the members of my family and friends Kshitij, Rahul, Niharika, Siddharth and Avinash. Finally my thanks to the teachers in my centre, the staff of JNU and the various libraries in Delhi, who cooperated fully during my research.
