ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Although the present work is the result of my hard labour, it would not have materialised in the first place without the valuable help I received so generously from many persons and institutions. I hereby take this opportunity of thanking them in this note of gratitude.

First and foremost, I am grateful to my beloved guide, Dr. Amit Sen, LL.M., Ph.D. (London), for suggesting the topic and for the generous help he rendered to me in the preparation of the various chapters, which are now in black and white. Dr. Sen, in spite of his heavy preoccupations at the University of Calcutta where he is the Head of the Department of Law, took great pains in scrutinising each and every bit of the materials collected by me. He suggested the plan of work, and the layout of the work. He is to me a perfect guide, and if I may be allowed to add a model 'friend, philosopher and guide'. All along he treated me more as his younger brother and it is his magnanimity that I have been able to pen down my work in an atmosphere of informality which removed the tensions and worries which are always present when a person sets out to write on a subject.

I am extremely grateful also to Mr. C.P. Srivastava, Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organisation (IMO), London for sending me all the materials he had in the possession of the IMO relevant to my subject. It was the nobility of this great man, who in spite of the heavy duties of his distinguished office, to have taken a personal interest in sending me the materials, asking me to contact the other subsidiary bodies of the United Nations and more important in wishing me success in my work and in conveying his blessings to me. As I wrote later to Mr. Srivastava, and I reiterate again, words really fail me as to how I can express my thanks to him for all that he has done for me. His magnanimity makes me feel today what a small person I am.

I also take this opportunity of thanking Dr. Nagendra Singh, President of the International Court of Justice, The Hague, for the valuable suggestions in sending their report 'Substandard Vessels Particularly Those Registered Under Flags of Convenience', a report which was very vital to my work.

The different libraries of Calcutta were also a source of immense help in the preparation of my work. I was extremely benefited by the three foreign libraries stationed in Calcutta viz. The British Council Library, The American Center Library and The American University Center Library, and also by our two libraries, the library of the Law Department of the University of Calcutta and the National Library of Calcutta, for the valuable law books and journals I consulted on my topic.

I also take this opportunity of thanking the Indian Law Institute, New Delhi, of whose library I was a member. I availed of the valuable services of this institute and the vast almost ocean-like materials it has on International Law -- text-books, journals and reports. All these materials formed the base of my work and on account of this foundation, I was able to proceed smoothly when I had began writing.

I also take this opportunity of thanking two of my personal friends both of whom worked as my alter ego. They are Mr. Subhas Chandra Das and Mr. P.K. Kataruka, the latter my class-mate from school days. Both of them in spite of their busy schedule and workload worked with me in unison in helping me scrutinise the materials and in getting the relevant portions photocopied. Today these materials form my proud possession.

I am proud of my parents whose inspiration, guidance, encouragement and help in writing this work provided more than an incentive. Every morning, for days on together, after my draft was made of a chapter or topic, my father would ask me of the progress. He went through each and every manuscript, made the vital corrections and suggested valuable amendments all of which I have incorporated in my work. He would scan newspapers, journals and magazines in search of the latest materials and cases relevant to my work, note the same down for me and ask me to work on the same if they were relevant to my work. My parents made it clear that I should devote myself fully to my research work and its success would be a part of my family work and duty. They specified again and again that the success of my work would be greatest satisfaction for them. God has indeed blessed me with model parents! Without my parents' inspiration and blessings and their daily prayer for my success, I have my serious doubts if I could proceed beyond the first chapter. If my work is a success, I owe it all to them. I pray to God that He may bless my parents always.

My sisters, brother and brothers-in-law also provided me with valuable and necessary help in bringing out my work, particularly in their volunteering to get the necessary papers for writing the manuscripts and typing papers without which my work would have remained largely still-born.

Lastly, I am indebted to my wife, Nirmala, who in spite of my best or worst provocation refused to lose her cool. She functioned as my secretary in filing the materials in a way which was scientific for me. She maintained my files containing the manuscripts chapter-wise and read out the same while I typed them.

As Justice M.C. Chagla wrote in his autobiography "Roses in December" that a book is generally the result of a co-operative effort, and what I have written above vindicates the above remark of this venerable and great man. I feel that I have been fortunate in this respect in giving a written shape to my subject of research with the cooperation of the persons I approached.
