For success in life proper adjustment to one's environment is essential. The problem of adjustment has become so vital in our complex and civilized society that psychologists have turned their deep interest in understanding it.

Problems in destitute homes tend to be function of the total growth of the destitute home students. Love and acceptance help the child to develop a basic sense of trust toward his parents and the world around him, which becomes a major safeguard against fear and anxiety—thus giving him the feeling of security. He needs to be able to explore his environment confidently and accept its demands; the problems of orphan children who live without parental love and acceptance can increased so they don't adjust properly in the society. Attempts made by government and privately sponsored agencies seem to touch their problems.
