ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It takes a village to write a dissertation. A large number of people have been part of this journey and in their own ways have supported me and my research through these five years.

The first person I owe this dissertation to is my supervisor Dr Shilpa Phadke. She has taken great interest and excitement in my work from day one, even before I got into the PhD program. She has given me the space, kindness, generosity and encouragement that is required for any researcher to develop and flourish. She has patiently held my hand through the ups and downs, seen me through periods of exhilaration and self-doubt and has been always there to offer comfort, advice and support. Under her able mentorship, I have grown to be a confident researcher. She has been generous with her contacts and gone out of her way to see to it that I make the most of the five years. She has helped me not just with my writing, but with conference papers, publications, exchange programmes, procuring funding and subsequently post-doctoral applications. In short, she has trained me to make a life in academia after I complete the PhD, while assuring me of her continued support. Her meticulous comments on drafts and discussions have helped me write better papers. She has also been there at times of personal distress and has been available to discuss personal dilemmas. This has helped in making sense of life, which is so intimately tied to doing a PhD. Her enthusiasm and passion for research has always been infectious and she has provided me with a life-long role model- as scholar, supervisor and mentor. She has had faith in me when I never had any, and that has helped me take risks with new ideas and to produce cutting edge research. She has pushed me to test my limits and to produce better work, always believing in my abilities as a researcher. She has been like the kind parent who watches their child from afar, letting them explore and learn, while always having their child’s back. I have always looked up to her from the beginning of my PhD and will continue to do so for the passion that she brings to her work and the kindness and patience that she brings to her mentoring. I have also learnt from her what a democratic mentor-student relationship is like. She always sought to break down hierarchies and treated me with great respect as a peer. I could not have dreamt of a better supervisor and I consider myself extremely fortunate to have done my PhD under her guidance.
My doctoral advisory committee members, Prof Nandini Manjrekar and Dr Bindhulakshmi have both been a great source of help through the years. Their comments on various stages of the PhD have been useful and along with my supervisor they have always been encouraging and given me ample space and respect to explore and write.

The dissertation has been funded by two projects and a fellowship. The first project was with Prof Nandini Manjrekar and Prof Disha Nawani in the School of Education in 2012-2013. The second project was with Dr Shilpa Phadke in 2013-2014. All three project heads have been kind and accommodating and allowed me enough time and flexibility to work both on my research and the projects. From 2014-2016 I received the Doctoral Fellowship in Women’s Studies from the Indian Council of Social Science Research (ICSSR). The fellowship was routed through the Centre for Women’s Development Studies (CWDS) where I was allotted a mentor- Dr Renu Addlakha. I thank ICSSR, Dr Addlakha and the faculty and staff at CWDS for their generous support.

Libraries have been a second home to me. They have also been my primary work space during the PhD. I have made use of two libraries during my research: the Sir Dorabji Tata Memorial Library at Tata Institute of Social Sciences, Mumbai and the French Institute of Pondicherry (IFP) library at Pondicherry. I thank the staff at both libraries for their support. I also thank the Doctoral Students’ Office and the administrative staff at Tata Institute of Social Sciences for their support and cooperation.

Early drafts of chapters have been presented at various conferences and workshops in India and I thank all participants, peers, friends and senior scholars who have commented on my work. I have benefitted from comments at various stages from Prof Anjali Monteiro, Dr Asha Achuthan, Dr Rajeev Kumaramkandath, Prof Meena Gopal and Prof Meenakshi Thapan. Dr Lisa Trimble and Dr Emily Henderson have always supported me academically in the form of helping me procure articles and publications.

I am intellectually indebted to number of scholars whose work continues to inspire me: Carole Vance, Jen Gilbert, Lata Mani, Eva Illouz, Jack Halberstam, Eve
Sedgwick and Saba Mahmood to just name a few. I am grateful for getting the opportunity to review Gilbert’s book Sexuality in School: The Limits of Education in 2014. Her book changed the way I conceptualised sexuality education and introduced me to excellent work in queer theory and psychoanalysis, especially the writings of Eve Sedgwick, Winnicott, Heather Love, Jack Halberstam, Kathryn Bond Stockton among others. The title of my dissertation is inspired by her path-breaking book.

A number of people have provided me with a strong support system in Mumbai. All the women I shared a house/flat over the last five years and who became a family of sorts: Vinodini Aunty and Rashmi Rangarajan for daily conversations and dinners; Nisha Rani, Ashmita Sharma, Safrin Begum, Suchismita Roy for their warmth, conversations and hours spent on my balcony and most importantly Jaya Tai who cooked, cleaned and looked after me (thus freeing me to focus on my writing) - her friendship, wisdom and care is irreplaceable.

Many friends and colleagues at Tata Institute of Social Sciences have been a source of support, laughter, fun and madness: Ranu Tomar, Bhagyashree Mundhe, Asha Singh for their friendship in the initial years; Sahana Mitra for indulging and handholding me in a number of ways; Anup Tripathi for his continued friendship and help through the years; Anjor Bhaskar- twin and confidante par excellence- for bringing sunshine into our lives on campus and teaching me warmth and affection; Prerna Gautam for allowing me to pamper her and accepting me with an open heart; Mukesh Kumar for allowing me to mentor him and for our shared passion for academia; Abhinav Kapoor for his tenderness and affection; Taranga Sriraman for support at crucial times; Roshni Chattopadhyay for sharing our passion for cultural studies, feminism and research; Vasudha Mohanka for her camaraderie and conversations; Johann Salazar for his friendship over the years; Malini Krishnankutty for her friendship and encouragement; Ketoki Majumdar, Maddy Manchi, Ajay Saini – seniors who willingly guided me in the intricacies of a PhD.

Outside the Institute, a number of colleagues have supported me with their friendship and love: Sandali Thakur for endless midnight conversations on academia, research, feminism, social movements, activism, relationships and marriage; Ajay Maherchandani for sharing my passion for philosophy, spirituality and theory and daily conversations; Romit Chowdhury for kindling and sustaining my interest in masculinities, long conversations about academia and being a wonderful colleague and friend; Rashmi Pragna – sister – for long phone conversations about love, longing, heartbreak, loneliness, singlehood, academia and for being there without my asking; Nupur Samuel for our conversations about academia, relationships, singlehood and handholding me through the panic stages of the PhD; Ignacio Arellano Torres for his friendship over the years and mostly for always believing in my abilities as a scholar; Lav Ahuja, Satwinder Singh and Jenish Shah for fun times; Soham Munim, Sneha and Amar Kakkad, Sudhi and Kushal Sengupta, Saswati and Ravi and Jeraz Bhagat for bringing a slice of home/Pondicherry to Mumbai; Shasvath Kapadia for his friendship, long conversations and being there at moments of panic. Rashmi Pragna, Nupur Samuel, Shrikant Bharadwaj and Johann Salazar have been kind to copy edit and comment on a draft of the chapters; I cannot thank them enough.

Most of my writing took place in Pondicherry and many people have supported me through that phase: Sukshma Poddar for our daily walks, utter madness together and for her unflinching support; Vandana Shah and Shreya Roy for their continued friendship and laughter; Malhar and all the kids at the kindergarten for much needed children-time; Devangi Ramakrishnan, Olympia Gerald and Rijuta Talreja for their friendship; Alexandra de Heering for lunches and conversations on academia; Dr Brigitte Sebastia at IFP for being an endless source of encouragement and enthusiasm; Satyajit Roy, Satyam Putti and Prasanna Mohapatra - sea swimming companions; Karra and all the dogs I know for licks, tail wagging and belly rubs.

I also thank all the participants I have interviewed. They have all been very brave to share intimate details of their lives and work. I have been fortunate to have earned their trust.

Three therapists have helped me cope with loneliness, singlehood, anxiety, stress and much more. They helped me look at things from a different perspective. I couldn’t have done this without their sessions: Dr Alok Pande, Swapnil Pange and Shreya Mhatre. My homeopath Dr Adhay’s medicines and positive energies also kept me going through little illnesses and stress. Extended family members have also supported me through these years: Bharti jiji, Mehul, Swasti and Shobha Aunty in Mumbai have been there in difficult times and cared for me through illness; Aparna didi, Shreemanjari and their family have hosted me on my frequent visits to Delhi.

Lastly, no words are enough to thank my parents. They have unquestioningly supported me financially, emotionally and been with me through every step, joy and struggle of the PhD. The PhD has not been my journey alone, but theirs too. They have read every paper I have presented, every article I have published. They have lived vicariously through my travels and conferences. They have heard me rant about all the new things I read and learnt. They have learnt to come to terms with my politics and way of life. While I have learnt a lot through the PhD, they have also evolved with me through it. It has helped me start and continue conversations with them on freedom, space, feminism, sexuality, academia and career. The PhD has not just shaped my life and research, but our lives as a family.
