Acknowledgement

For a thesis that took almost four years to complete, it is but natural that I stand indebted to a large number of persons. I take this opportunity to thank all individuals and institutions who have supported me in some way or the other during the study period. It is clear that this work would not have been possible without their continuous support and encouragement. I have tried my best to incorporate their valuable ideas, thoughts and experiences in my study.

The first step towards the writing of this thesis was my meeting with Professor Patricia Uberoi at Institute of Economic Growth, University of Delhi, to discuss the theme for my PhD. I express my gratitude to her for showing me the direction towards such a fruitful work. Her words still echo as, ‘a PhD is an investment that gives life long return’. She guided me to take up a study on an issue that I would be interested in for a longer period and not be just involved in doing investigative journalism. Her suggestion helped me to take up this interesting area of study and pursue it as an “investment”.

I had only one chance to meet Professor Uberoi but in my day-to-day struggle, I had the support and encouragement of my supervisor, Professor Maitrayee Chaudhuri. She took the pain to continuously push me to go ahead with the ‘good’ work that I had taken up. She made me write and rewrite till it took its present form. It was her close and strict supervision that provoked the best out of me.

The person to introduce me both to the issue and the field was my brother-in-law, Chandra Prakash, who happened to work as a social compliance auditor. He did show lack of confidence in me in the beginning and suggested that I take up something different for my Ph.D. But my perseverance made him change his opinion and he agreed to provide all support to me. It was with his reference that I managed to enter the garment factories, interview auditors and buying agencies and also accompany auditors for social compliance audit.
I express my thanks to all the auditors, factory-managers and workers who spared time and energy to answer my queries and be part of group discussion. To name a few of them, Mr Venkat of Intertek Testing Services, Mr Pradeep Kumar and Ms Mridula Sinha of Gap Inc and Mr Sanjib Sinha of Bureau Veritas.

I thank the librarian and staff of Jawahar Lal Nehru University, V. V Giri National Labour Institute, Centre for Education and Communication, Centre for Women Development Studies, National Institute of Applied Economics, Institute of Integrated Learning and Management. I thank Sambodhi Research and Communication Centre for teaching me the techniques of quantitative data analysis that has been attempted at a few places in my study.

I thank all my ends who stayed with me through the years waiting patiently to get the 'good news' that I have finally submitted my thesis. For many it appeared to be a never-ending battle. A word of special thanks to my friend, Anil, for supporting me in different ways and appreciated my hard work.

The work would not have been completed without the blessing of my parents and family members who always prayed for my wellness and good health. A special thank for the young ones- my nephew (Nonu) and niece (Janu) – who would put energy in me with they smile and pranks. I owe my work to the hard time that my younger brother and elder sister had while editing my work and giving me suggestions for improving the quality of work.

My apologies if I have inadvertently omitted to thank anybody.

New Delhi
16th August 2007

Archana Prasad