Acknowledgements

At the end of writing a dissertation of over a lakh words, writing the acknowledgements should seem a simple matter. But how does one express, without the felicity of Āndāl, Madhurakavi or Pēriyāḻvār, one’s love, gratitude and regard for family, teachers and friends? I have received so much from so many people that no thanks can suffice; I can only be grateful for this opportunity to mention some of them.

My research supervisor, Prof Kunal Chakrabarti, ‘guide’ in popular parlance, has been friend, philosopher and guide in the true sense of the term. Paraphrasing Elizabeth Barrett Browning, I could say, “How shall I thank thee? Let me count the ways...” and never reach the end. A scholar of immense range and depth who showed me how to ask diverse questions of my materials, a wonderful teacher whose engagement with and comments on my work made me believe in it, a careful supervisor whose attention to detail did not exclude even misplaced commas—when I did give him something to read, and an eternally patient one, understanding when I failed, time after time, to do so. As valuable as his supervision of my work has been Kunal da’s friendship—and that is perhaps my greatest reward of doing this thesis.

“Guru Gobind dou khade, kāke lāgoon pāy/ baliḥārī guru āpane, Gobind diyo milāy”. Kabir’s dohā juxtaposing God and Guru may be transposed in my case to Guru and Kumkum. Gentle and generous, serene and sensitive, undemanding and ever-giving, like mother earth, Kumkum is someone I wish I were more like, but knowing I cannot be, feel blessed just to know.

I can no more thank Basant for our long, meandering conversations than for his marvellous mangoes, but I can, and do, for the donkey work he has done for me over the last few months.

So many friends have touched my life in these eight years... Deeksha whose affection and support I have always taken for granted, Tuni/ Sharmishta who from across the oceans is as present in my life today as when we were roommates twenty years ago, Harish and Shahana who have given me the gift of the mountains, Naina whose sincerity and academic engagement are an inspiration, Saswati with whom I share the joys and tribulations of writing and who scolded me at regular intervals for dragging the PhD, Anant, Farah, Hina, and Jayeeta who found books and articles not available in Delhi, Madras or JSTOR, Rohini whose lovely library of comfort reading was ever open to me, Meenakshi who took me to Hampi, Madhu, Meeta, Ranjeeta, Shibani, Sneh, Snigdha and Yousuf who have all enriched my work or life in some way — thank you all.

This work could not have been done without the help, inputs and advice of several scholars. The late Prof J Parthasarathi, distinguished linguist and scholar of Śrīvaishṇavism, made the medieval Tamil-Manipravāla hagiographies accessible to me—but more of him later. Prof NS Sadagopan, Sanskrit scholar, read with me the Rāmānujāryya Divya Caritai and sections of the Nālāyiram, and patiently found me references from various Sanskrit texts. Prof KKA Venkatachari who has been teacher and mārgadarśaka for two generations of scholars and researchers on Śrīvaishṇavism, was characteristically generous with his vast knowledge. My thanks to his family too, which made me feel at home during the time I worked in his private library in Triplicane. In Delhi, I had the privilege and benefit of discussing this project in its early stages with Prof R Champakalakshmi. Prof KM Shrimlai’s insightful comments on a chapter that I presented at a seminar in JNU helped to refine my arguments. Prof Vijaya Ramaswamy’s valuable comments have made me rethink certain aspects of the work. Shrivatsa Goswami ji let me access his collection of rare books and journals in Brndavan. I owe a special debt to Prof Kesavan Veluthat whom I pestered with questions and doubts during his visit to JNU in March 2009; he responded with unflagging generosity, patience and, indeed, enthusiasm. I have also benefited hugely from discussing certain puzzling issues with Prof John Stratton Hawley.

My thanks also go out to the various libraries and their staff who made this research possible: the Kuppuswami Sastri Research Institute and the Adayar Library in Madras, Miranda House (Hanuman, Hasina, Lateef, Om Prakash, Ramesh, Ratan Lal, Sunil & YK Sharma), the Indian Council of Historical Research (Mr. Sahay, Malvika, Nardev Sharma, Joshi, Naresh, Indu), Sahitya Akademi (Mr. Padmanabhan) and Jawaharlal Nehru University in Delhi, and the American Institute for Indian Studies (Mr. Yadav and Jagannath) in Gurgaon.

I thank Miranda House for the grant of three years of study leave to enable me to concentrate on my research. A fellowship from the Indian Council of Historical Research allowed me to take three months’ further leave from teaching to finish the project.
During my fieldwork in Madras, I stayed with my grandmother Rukmini, who, both as a practising Śrīvaiśṇava with a deep interest in the intellectual traditions of her faith and from affection, took a keen interest in my work. So did her brother—my grand-uncle Prof J Parthasarathi, who, despite his eighty eight years, read the texts with me for several hours every day and discussed my work in exhaustive detail. As grandchildren themselves of the great Tamil savant and scholar of Śrīvaiśnavism Prof Mu Raghava Iyengar, they were particularly excited about a member of the ‘younger generation’ of the lineage returning to the study of the religious and literary tradition. I deeply regret that neither of them is around anymore to rejoice in the completed work.

My maternal aunt Komala was like a fairy godmother during my stay in Madras. I cannot thank her or my uncle Krishnamurty enough for all that they did to ensure my comfort and also for making several pilgrimage/field trips richer by their company. The home of my paternal aunt and uncle, Lakshmi and Sundararajan, was equally a home away from home. There I found too, friendship and company of my own age in Kumar, Charu, Raghu and Uttara. Appu/Preeti took an eager and amused interest in my work and found humour in the most unexpected places. I must thank too, my grand-uncle’s family who made me a part of their household.

My family. Simply put, I would not be able to do anything without the support, care and love of every one of them. What do I single out to mention among the great and small things that each one has done for me and continues to do each day? Sundari and Kanya seem to have a fair degree of regard both for my work and for me while Kesu and Madhu keep me from taking either too seriously. Kunju, on discovering that I meant to acknowledge the help I have received for my work, seriously reminded me that she always runs to fetch me the dictionary whenever I ask for it. But it will be many years before she or Nitya understand that more than bringing me dictionaries or atlases, they have brought joy and, indeed, meaning into my life.

Finally, Appa and Amma. There is of course no way to thank one’s parents. But I must note that the only reason I ever finished this work was because Appa kept up the pressure relentlessly, so much so that I hid the novels I read inside textbooks like a truant teenager. Amma repeatedly read, explained and translated hymns from the Nālāyira Divya Prabanadham with great care and read the sthalapurāṇas so often that she can probably recite the tale of each shrine in her sleep now. Their concern and involvement with my project has scarcely been less than my own. To them both, I dedicate this work.
