Acknowledgement

A good number of persons and institutions helped me in writing this thesis. I would like to dedicate this work to all of them. They include a fraternity of comrades – Sidheshwar Shukla, Tapas, Kavita, Mona, Awadesh, Sanjeev, and Sandeep – with whom I have learnt the anatomy of transformative praxis and saw closely how a communist strives for purity, justice, truth, and how communism or Marxism, at times, can mean a pragmatic philosophy, the politics of egalitarian power. They include Vikram, Rishi, and Digvijay who have shared with me a certain essence of the mining society on the campus itself. They include Smt. Radha Devi-Singhchaudhary, who like mother earth bore innumerable problems – incurring financial debt, community censure, neighbourhood opposition – to educate me and see me construct my own chosen destiny in a non-compromising way. They include some of my mentors like Prabhu Mohapatra, Chitra Joshi, Partho Dutta, and Rohan D’ souza, who have gone at times far beyond the call of duty as teachers to shape a rustic researcher like me. They include many friends, companions, librarians, archivists, and miners - comrades in the coalfields, who have further proved that every project of the formation of knowledge is essentially a collective, associative labour that inevitably puts to question the logic of the patent regime. My supervisor showed me what a socialist teacher could look like and the effect he could have on his students.

I have received financial and logistical support from a number of institutions: Indian Council of Social Science Research, Sarai, A.N. Sinha Social Science Research Institute (Patna), National Labour institute (Noida), CHS-DSA, and JNU-SYLFF (Jawaharlal Nehru Young Leadership Fund). I would like to thank them all.
