ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It is at the end of a project that one realises the efforts and contributions of various people who have played a central or peripheral part in its fruition. The most important of these is my supervisor, Prof. Utsa Patnaik, to whom I owe more than this thesis. She has taught me the importance of academic rigour, and of precision and meticulousness in work, which will remain invaluable lessons for me. Her patience and thoroughness during our discussions set an example that I shall strive to follow. I would like to thank her for her guidance and for her help at critical junctures of my work, without which this thesis would not have attained its present form.

I would also like to thank the Dean of the School of Social Sciences, and the administrative staff of the Centre and of the School. Their help at every stage in this work has been essential in the completion of this thesis.

A most essential part of this thesis has been the fieldwork in Gujarat, and for the successful completion of that, there are many people and institutions to whom I owe my deepest gratitude. Foremost among them are the Director and staff of the Behavioural Science Centre in Ahmedabad, who extended their unconditional support to me and put the resources of the organisation at my disposal. The former Director of the organisation, Mr. Dinesh Parmar, the present Director, Dr. Varsha Ganguly, and almost every member of the staff, have believed in me and motivated my work. Minaxi took great care in typing the Gujarati version of the questionnaire. I wish to thank especially Mr. Vasudevbhai for his help in selecting the villages; Mr. Amrutbhai and Mr. Jogabhai for their untiring assistance in taking me from village to village; Mr. Sanjaybhai of village Radosan and Mr. Sendhabhai of village Hardevasna, who opened their homes to me and assisted me in conducting the survey; the management of Kalibel Ashram for giving me lodging, and Mr. Amratbhai who accompanied me and helped me with translation from the local dialect. I most sincerely thank Mr. J. M. Pandya, Asst. Collector, Dangs district, who made available all the amenities of his office and information that I needed for the district. Many thanks are due to Mr. Vijaykumar Gohel and his family, who extended their warm hospitality, and gave me the benefit of their local knowledge, during my stay in the Dangs district. Most importantly, I wish to express my heartfelt gratitude to every family of the villages which took time and effort to answer questions which to them were a meaningless irritant that interfered in their busy routine, for no other reason except to help 'someone progress in their studies'.
At a very different level I thank all the members of the academic fraternity in Gujarat who have encouraged me and given invaluable intellectual input to this work. I would like to mention Prof. Sudarshan Iyengar, Vice-Chancellor, Gujarat Vidyapeeth, Ahmedabad, and Prof. Kiran Pandya, Professor at the Veer Narmad South Gujarat University, who gave me valuable suggestions and guidance at different points in the research, Prof. Ravindra Dholakia, IIM, Ahmedabad, Prof. B. M. Desai, formerly of IIM Ahmedabad, and also Mr. Astad Pastakia, for their useful inputs in the context of development in Gujarat.

The years of this research have had their share of self-doubt, frustration and nervousness. My friends and family helped me pull on despite all the moments of diffidence. From the bottom of my heart I thank my parents who believed in me and encouraged me at every step, and gave me the warmth of their experience and their confidence in me, to keep me going. I wish to acknowledge especially my friend and mentor Dr. Fernando Franco, to whom I owe my interest in development economics and in working with people, and who inculcated in me the understanding that academics and development policy can and must feed into each other. Without his worldview I believe I would not have chosen this line of work. My friends, Shibani, Jyotsna and Arnav, who have been there when I needed them, with words of support or a shove in the right direction, whichever was required, must also be acknowledged. Also my friends Paul, Jimmy and Fr. Raj, who helped me with the initial process of getting acclimatised in Delhi and/or JNU. I also want to thank Aniket in a special way for all the dinners and discussions at his house and over the internet with him, which provided much-needed breaks in monotony.

My friends in the University, Irshad and Nesar, and those in Tapti Hostel which has been my home for these five years, have been a substitute family for me. They have helped me, with everything ranging from much-required cups of tea to heart-to-heart talks late into the night. I want to thank Prarthi, Mohita, Upasana, Alifyah, Bijoya, Namrata, Suchi, Anindita, Veena, Sona, Jenny and Lisa, for more things than I can enumerate here. For the academic and non-academic discussions, the parties and cookouts, and for being there – every one of them – when I needed them the most, I would like to say many many thanks. I do not think I would have been able to complete this thesis without the presence of these friends. And in the end, I would like to thank Indraneel, for giving this work a much longer-term perspective, and making it a beginning to better things.
