Thanksgiving is one peculiar cultural practice, where I time and again feel linguistic gymnastics falls short of the emotion it is intended to carry. However, its explicit or implicit presence is absolutely necessary for the simple reason that one recalls where one is rooted.

I owe a lot to Prof R. K. Mahanta, who instilled in me the interest in Linguistics. He was forever there in absentia, inspiring me at every step.

I can never thank Professor P. Madhavan for the way he embraced my work at the most crucial moment of my research. He gave it a new life when it was most needed. I am too indebted to him for his dedicated guidance and incisive criticism to express my thanks through words.

If there is any research attempt in this study, the credit undoubtedly goes to Prof S. V. Parasher. His sudden illness deprived it of a fierce critic and a sincere well-wisher. I owe my deepest gratitude to him for inspiring me at the early stages of my research programme with his wealth of experience.

If I have been lucky in my academic life, still more so have I been in my personal life. The companionship and love of my husband constantly ensured me that I write this dissertation in an ideal state, and no thanks could be enough for him. Neither can I thank my mom for everything she means to me, for everything she has done, to make this research work possible. All my family members - particularly, Borata, Tumanda, Pehi, Dadu, Ma, Deuta, Pompi, Rinkuba - were beside me whenever I needed them. Nirmali also stood beside me through thick and thin. I always wonder what Tata would have said about it – we would have spent hours and hours on this word or that, this section or the other. The angst is too deep to endure.

In spite of his illness, Prof S. K. Verma was always with me patiently reading my papers, jotting down every minute detail and suggestion for improvement. I will ever be grateful to him and his wife for extending so much affection and care.

Prof Aditi Mukherjee, with her amiable nature, was ever available to me to discuss my papers and issues in discourse and related fields. I am particularly grateful to her for the way she spared her busy hours for me.

My sincere thanks to Prof Nirupama Rastogi, Prof Lakshmi Chandra, Prof K. V. Tirumalesh, and Prof V. Prakasam for examining my Ph. D. term papers and offering suggestions for modification. I am particularly grateful to Prof Lakshmi Chandra for her unwavering faith in me and my work and the enormous interest she has in my welfare. I am also grateful to Prof Jaysheelan for his kind advice.

Dr Rajeev Krishnan, with his usual patience, read parts of this dissertation and guided me to newer areas of Derrida studies. I extend my sincere thanks to him.

It was very encouraging on the part of Prof Berendt to send me his published papers on discourse and related topics.

Prof Bhatia boosted up my research enthusiasm at the incubatory period, with his lectures, papers and published materials.

Shashi extended timely help in drawing the tables and diagrams, so did Naba and Ranjanda in any problem I faced related to the computer. I owe special thanks to them, as well as to Tirumala, Anila, Shantala, Chayanika, Rahul, Sana and everybody else in our hostel who cared so much for me and my work.

Thanks to all the members of the CIEFL community who attended my Open Presentation and offered their valuable suggestions. I always believe research is a collaborative work and CIEFL gave me an excellent opportunity to utilise this collaborative nature that the institute inherently possesses.
