Acknowledgements

This work was written in spite of the non-availability of several extremely important books and articles in India. The stamp of a Third World scholar is perhaps rightly reflected in this work, though hopefully not in its quality but in the quantity of literature referred to.

I would like to thank my supervisor Prof. Rajeev Bhargava for his co-operation and encouragement all through. To always take up the best and strongest formulation of the argument or position one is criticising is one of the things I learnt from him. I remember him telling me once that ‘bad conditions’ in our societies should not be made an excuse for shoddy work.

My ‘bad conditions’ were however greatly ameliorated by the JRF/SRF fellowship that I got from the University Grants Commission. As the present UGC is out to deprive future scholars of such fellowships, which would seriously hamper social science research, I am personally grateful to the anonymous tax payers from among the public.

I would also like to thank Prof. Joel Kovel for comments on an abstract of my work.

JNU library is a treasure house of books, which of course sometimes means one has to be ready to scan it rack by rack and maybe even book by book. Malik saab and Sangram Singhji however usually made my task much easier.
