Lodgaard refers to the empirical developments that have led to support for the view expressed in the 1995 Report on the Commission for Global Governance which makes a distinction between the security of states and people[s]. This followed collective security interventions on behalf of the UN, for example in Iraq (1991) and Somalia (1992–93) where the costs to humans, that is civilians, caused by the state and in the absence of the state respectively, indicated that security had widened qualitatively, or in terms of the referent object.
