ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Research over a thesis that has flowed from the Centre for Historical Studies to the peripheries of Punjab, winding past mofussil towns to search out Vaidas and Mahants, pharmacies and Deras, cannot but have accumulated all manner of debts, both intellectual and social.

A large number of institutions and individuals, have contributed in the search and piecing together of the research and ideas in this thesis. The National Archives of India and the Punjab State Archives at Patiala and Chandigarh provided relatively smooth access to their holdings. The librarians and staff of the Punjabi University Library, Patiala, the Guru Nanak Dev University and Khalsa College Libraries, Amritsar, the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library, Delhi, the Baring Union Christian College, Batala, and the Cambridge Brotherhood, Delhi extended their cooperation during these searches. Smaller libraries like the Swatantranand Library, Amritsar, the Vishvesharanand Institute, Hoshiarpur and the Dayanand Math, Dina Nagar offered tracts and even library indexes that gave valuable leads in tracking Vaid writings or the activities of their patrons.

An early part of this work was presented at a seminar at the School of Oriental and African Studies in London, and benefited in particular from the comments made by Daud Ali, the organizer, and later editor, of the Seminar’s presentations. During that stay, a grant from the British Council allowed me to consult libraries and research holdings. The Nehru Trust, Teen Murti Foundation supported me with a research grant through the latter part of my thesis.
Many individuals and families have helped and hosted me during my fieldwork. In particular, Sardar Balvinder Singh, Sardar Swaran Singh, Vaid Kranti Pathak and Mahant Mohan Das in Amritsar helped me locate Vaid families, conduct interviews amongst Vaid Mandal office bearers, and to speak to elusive Mahants. Sanjeev Sharma generously shared the family papers left by his grand-father, Pandit Ram Prasad Sharma and patiently answered questions regarding family ties, politics and publications.

Another long standing contact, Bawa Harbhajan Singh, was always willing to give me access to his collection of rare tracts, Vaid Sammelan reports, journals and offered insights into the ideas and organization behind Vaid mobilization in and around Amritsar. My most extended contacts, by interviews and correspondence, were with the Bhai Mohan Singh Vaid family in Tarn Taran and Delhi. I recollect the interest expressed by the late Sukhbir Singh Vaid in this research and his brother, Sardar Ardaman Singh’s readings from his father’s Diaries.

Last but not least, I thank my supervisor, Professor Majid Siddiqi, who endured prolonged research trails, and some self-doubt, and encouraged me to believe in and speak-up for my work. Much as he would, I know, like to stand aside from any virtues, if at all, in this work, I am certain that it was his probing of its arguments that enabled me to see the forest beyond the trees.

Theses seem to have a life cycle and academic rites of passage of their own, and more often than not these are not congruent with those in our own personal lives. Mine saw, the birth of a baby daughter, Karuna. Her birth briefly slowed this research, only to restore it due to her sporting forbearance of closed doors and curfews. Recently, it also saw the passing away of an esteemed friend, Sardar Kirpal Singh, Sikh scholar and retired librarian of the Guru Nanak Dev University whose interest guided record-searches and interviews. Lastly, this research had the unflagging support of my family. To my parents Radha and K.A. Sivaramakrishnan, and my husband Vikram, it owes its beginning and its end. All errors in this thesis, however, are entirely my responsibility.
