"Expropriation of Alien Property and the Problem of Compensation" deals with various issues arising in the context of international law.

Although these issues are somewhat old and quite a few attempts have been earlier made to deal with them, the emergence of several new States as independent entities, concern on the part of many of them to briddle activities of the multinational corporations and added to it — clamour for a new international economic order — are some of the important factors calling for reappraisal of the traditional international law on the subject.

The quest for a viable and universally acceptable criterion for payment of compensation in cases of expropriation of alien property is perennial and must continue. The present study analyses recent debates within and outside the United Nations on this vital question and brings them up-to-date.
I owe a deep debt of gratitude to
Dr. R.P. Anand, Professor of International Law,
Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi, who supervised the entire work and made valuable suggestions. Without constant encouragement from him it would not have been possible for me to accomplish the present work.

I am also indebted to the Punjab Government which awarded me its State scholarship for working at the School of International Studies. An Overseas Research Fellowship from the British Institute of International and Comparative Law, London, enabled me to work at various libraries in London and to exchange views with many scholars and Professors there. I am, therefore, grateful to the Institute for the Fellowship. The authorities of the School of International Studies and staff of the libraries of the Indian Council of World Affairs as well as Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, who furnished me with necessary facilities are also worthy of mention.
