This PhD thesis has been made possible by the university, which adhered to exemplary transparency, standards and research facilities despite being run from a single rented block.

The Department of English in the School of Humanities and Languages housed a number of faculty members and none look askance at my presence in the same bustling room. They, in fact, encouraged it; I thank Khemraj, KBS Krishna, Hemraj, Shaweta, Chander Kant, Sayema, Prakriti, Anu, Renu and Gitanjali for a supportive atmosphere.

A large part, rather most, of the environs in the room that enabled this work was created by the exquisite headship of Prof. Roshan Lal Sharma. All of us who know him and work with his guidance and blessings are spoiled for life because reports suggest that such environs of freedom and openness are very rare in Indian universities. I thank him for his guiding vision.

In the capacity of my supervisor Roshan Sir is equally noble and inimitable. His imprints on this work are indelible and I am, and will ever remain, full of gratitude for this. Countless meals (always at his expense) we had together at Ajay’s Dhaba were a mentorship at-large, and an unforgettable experience.

My Navodian friends—Vijay, Bhupender, Ashok, and Kunal—have supported me in many ways almost like telecom towers quietly giving signal strength to an unsteady handset. My family has been an unswerving support system through and through.

Anil has been indefatigable mate, friend and a reassuring presence without whom cluelessness sets in quickly. Kanu and Kalyani, made this journey very interesting. Cameo appearances of Prof. Arlene Plevin have been helpful in intangible ways.

Salubrious setting of Dramman and its people, who welcomed us to their homes and dhams (particularly in absence of adequate hostels and mess), remained a bulwark against drudgery of academic work of writing a thesis. I thank them and many others whom I could not mention due to paucity of space here.
