Acknowledgement

When I planned writing the thesis, I thought writing the acknowledgement section is the easiest among all chapters. Thus, I scheduled the acknowledgement section to be the last part of thesis writing. But when I seriously considered writing this section, it appeared to be the most difficult job in hand. As I go back in time and remember about all those who have influenced me directly or indirectly in making my Ph. D. days fruitful; many faces strike my mind. Starting from my family, my teachers, friends and peers in the field, each and every individual has been instrumental in shaping my personality as well as nurturing my career as a research student. It is practically impossible to categorize their contribution and address it with different remarks. These 5 years of my life would not have been enjoyable without the active or passive involvement of any of them. Had the brainograph been a reality (an instrument described in a science fiction novel that can read our feelings about others), I would have simply taken out print outs of my feelings about them and paste it in the acknowledgement section. Nonetheless, to conclude formally, I express hearty gratitude to everyone with whom I have been associated directly or indirectly during these years, without whose help this work could not have been completed.
