ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am indebted to Dr. R.S. Gupta, my Supervisor, for his help and guidance in enabling me to complete this study. In Dr. Gupta I found more than a supervisor appointed to guide a researcher. He is as rich in personal qualities as in his understanding of the subject. His affectionate and gentle nature and prompt attention to my work encouraged me to complete this study in so short a period.

I am grateful also to my neighbour and senior colleague, Shri Raj Kumar Khanna of Zakir Hussain College, Delhi, for virtually goading me into working for a Ph.D. degree in ELT, the area of my interest. At a time when I had left all thoughts of reading for this degree, for I could not afford to stay at CIEFL Hyderabad for three long years, and was content to keep alive my interest in ELT with the help of the British Council Library in Delhi, Shri Khanna showed me the way: why not work at the JNU? Hitherto, the possibility of working in this area at our next door neighbour had never struck me.

At the JNU I received all help and encouragement from the faculty and the staff. I am grateful particularly to Dr. R.S. Gupta and to Shri H.C. Narang of the Centre of Linguistics and English. But for them this study would not have been possible. I often sought Shri Narang for his help and advice to deal with administration and to plan and discuss my work.

I thank my numerous colleagues in colleges in Delhi who helped me in feeding the questionnaire and spared their time to informally discuss with me the current practices of teaching reading. Thanks are also due to all the students who participated in this survey.

Dr. Ruddar Dutt, Principal and members of the teaching staff in the Department of English, School of Correspondence Courses & Continuing Education, Delhi University, gave me all cooperation and help in conducting my field work. I was permitted to use their students, classrooms, administrative and other facilities needed for classroom teaching. I am very grateful to all of them. I also must thank the students of the School who took part in this field work.

Dr. Amrit Khanna of Rajdhani College, Delhi, came to my help in making sense of the data I collected. He promptly lent me his copy of Statistics in Linguistics which gave me some idea of how to get the data analysed.

To Dr. N.K. Jain of the School of Correspondence Courses, Delhi I am indebted for more favours than I can recall and put down here. He made it possible for me to do my field work at the School, spared time to engage one of the groups while I was busy with the other, read through the manuscript and made valuable suggestions. I am very grateful to him.

I express my debt to several other persons and agencies which have enabled me to complete this study: Dr. N.L. Madan for translating the questionnaire into Hindi; the librarian, CIEFL Hyderabad for sending me Bulletins of Accession; the British Council, Madras for Focus on English; and Shri R.N. Chopra, Librarian, Dyal Singh Evening College, Delhi, for getting me the books I needed. I am also very grateful to the UGC for the financial assistance they provided me for this study under minor research grants.

No words can express my gratitude to my wife, Uma whose discussion and moral support have both been indispensable and to my children for patiently bearing during the period of this study deprivation of the attention expected from the head of the family.
