ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The idea of a specific study on the World Bank's lending to the social sector in India was born largely as a response to the visibly widening gaps in our country regarding access to important social services. Investments in the social sector play an undeniably important role in raising living standards, the denial of which can have serious consequences on a country's potential development. The specific case-studies of the Bank's lending in the health and education sectors undertaken as part of the study have helped develop a field level insight into the challenges and the scope of development in the Indian context. The completion of the study gives me an opportunity to convey my deep gratitude to a number of persons, whose support proved valuable in giving a final shape to the study.

First and foremost, I would like to thank my supervisor, Dr. C.S.R.Murthy for the extremely valuable contribution made in terms of both time and comments in identifying, developing and refining the flow of ideas. His persistence on rigour, clarity and consistency of thought has been encouraging and inspiring.

I would also like to thank numerous officials of the Government of India especially in the Department of Education and the Ministry of Health and Family Welfare for their co-operation and support. My thanks also to officials of the State Governments of Himachal Pradesh, Karnataka, Madhya Pradesh and Tamil Nadu for assisting with the collection of material on health and education programmes at the state-level.

My sincere thanks to the World Bank staff at the Washington office and the Resident mission in India for the access to official reports and the permission granted to work in the Bank Archives. I must admit that I was very impressed by the value that the Bank attached to professional discipline. In this context I would specially like to thank Mr. Charles Ziegler and Mr. Jim Huttlinger of the World Bank Archives for ensuring that my working conditions during my short stay in Washington in April 2000 were most comfortable and conducive to efficiency.

My thanks also to the library staff at the Madras Institute of Development Studies (Chennai), the Institute for Social and Economic Change (Bangalore), the National Institute of Educational Planning and Administration and the Nehru Memorial Library at New Delhi for their valuable co-operation and assistance. My deeply felt gratitude to also the students, teachers, doctors and other medical staff in different parts of India, who shared their valuable time and views that helped me get a feel of the situation at the ground level.

My thanks also to the University Grants Commission, for financially supporting the research through the grant of the Senior Research Fellowship. I am also grateful to the Jawaharlal Nehru University for sponsoring my field trip to Washington DC, that not only allowed me to physically work in the Bank Archives but also exposed me to develop valuable insights into the organisational dimensions of the Bank.

And finally my gratitude to my parents, family and friends for their unflinching support during the study. Their love and enthusiasm means more to me than I can express here.

I realise the limitations of the present study and hold myself solely responsible for the omissions.

December 30, 2002

(MOUSHUMI BASU)