Acknowledgements

The process of writing about history can change one’s sense of time. It can also teach one the importance of acknowledging debts, however ancient or recent. It is true of this thesis, taking this page far from being a formality.

First, I would like to thank my supervisor, Prof. Rekha Rajan, for supervising my work over the years with encouragement and caution, for teaching us to read literature ‘politically’ and also for explaining the relevance of standing securely on the border between disciplines. I thank her sincerely for a lot of academic freedom, for patiently helping me to organise and time my work, and for unhesitating help through discussions and material, without which this work would not have been possible.

I also thank Prof Uma Chakravarti, who made time to read painstakingly through the following chapters and who suggested changes and thrashed out many basic concepts. She pointed out the importance of not leaving things in unrelated fragments, and I thank her for her generosity with time and ideas.

I also thank the staff of the libraries of Jawaharlal Nehru University, Mumbai University, and the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. I would like to especially mention Mr Malik, without whom the JNU library would be an unreadable system.

I thank the University Grants’ Commission for the fellowship that enabled me to support this thesis financially.

The German Center was a good place to be, on account of the academic freedom it gave and its insistence on scientificity. It stood us in good stead.

I also thank Alissa Shethar who managed to get out of me a paper for the seminar of the Leibniz Society in Berlin, and for supplying relevant readings; and Parimala Rao for her timely need which started me off, and also Peter K. J. Park, UCLA, who sent in his paper on Friedrich Schlegel, at the last minute.

On a more personal note, I would like to thank my parents for their solid support, my mother for her acute sense of history, and my father for his unusually creative look at the present, which they both made an integral part of my growing up. Shreeia and Pranoti, who are more than just siblings, and for whom much of these chapters were written with the urgent wish to put things in perspective, shared in the anxiety right up to the finishing line. I thank them. Aji-ajoba in spite and because of the political divide.

Kavita, as always, gave her time and energy to fine tune the chapters, and has shared everything steadfastly for over a decade; Dhananjay has always been sensitive about space, both his and mine, stepped around mood landmines in the process of writing and kept up with me with solid support, surprisingly gentle criticism and calmness; Shubhra has given ideas and wholehearted appreciation always, put up with academic, personal and political rantings and stuck me back in one piece; Neha, and Rahee who shared material for Chapters II and III; have been my anchors in Bombay, Shikha has always given of the advantage of being a ‘history person’, and with typical sharpness, commented on everything, not just my work - and without them so many processes that went into understanding the material of this thesis would not have been possible.

I thank Shakti, for regular advice and being there till the last, Manisha, Sangita K for putting me up in Poona. Tithi, Tanweer, Bhavana, Nandini for all the V. I.s, Eliora, Rama, Ravi, Mona, John, Kavita a.,and Smita and Shalesh for Phule’s works. I thank Remi, Bulbul, and Sanjay for always keeping their doors open to me.

Ruth Schoneich for a debt long overdue, and R. Natu who would have wanted to see this thesis.

Comrades and friends in AISA over the years have helped inculcate the value of ‘taking a stand’ and convincing me that there is ‘no middle path’.
