Acknowledgments

I am grateful to the following people for their support, without which I could not have completed this dissertation. Prof. Mohammad Arif arranged accommodation for me at Banaras. He has also been generous in sharing his knowledge of contemporary local politics at Jayas. Dr. Chandrashekhar of the Persian Department at Delhi University was exceptionally generous with his time and gave me a crash course in elementary Persian grammar.

I am grateful to the Charles Wallace India Trust for a Grant-in-Aid that enabled me to travel to England and consult archives in London. I am also grateful to Dr. Rajani Badlani at the British Council, New Delhi, for her help in this respect.

Aditya Behl provided me with an initial reading list on the medieval romances of north India. I am also grateful to him for going out of his way to send me the manuscript of his just-published book on the Hindavi Sufi romances. Sumit Guha and Radhika Singha shared with me their insights into late-medieval and early-colonial north India.

Dr. Brajmohan Jawaliya helped me identify and trace some of the Padmini material in medieval Rajasthani. He was also very generous with his comments and advice. Dr. Hukam Singh Bhati and Shri Komal Kothari provided useful leads and information on the Rajput and Jain literature of medieval Rajasthan. I owe a special debt of gratitude to Dr. Mohabat Singh Rathod, Shri Ishwar Singh Ranawat and Mrs. Dhak at the Pratap Shodh Sansthan, Bhupal Nobles College, Udaipur. Dr. Rathod pointed me to the Chitor Udaipur Patnama, and Mrs. Dhak made special arrangements for me to copy large portions of the manuscript. Shri Rajendra Singhvi of Rajasthani Granthagar, Jodhpur, has provided steady support by supplying books on order and directing me to several scholars in Rajasthan. I am indebted to him for much of my Rajasthani material. Dilip Basu lent me his family's copy of the original edition of Yajneshwar Bandopadhyay's translation of Tod.

Staff at the following libraries helped in tracing and photocopying manuscripts and articles: at the British Library (Oriental and India Office Collections and Rare Books Collection); the Librarian and especially the Library Assistant, Dimple Shah, at the Royal Asiatic Society, London; at the Library of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London; and at the Nagar Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi. The librarian at the Acharya Shri Kailassagarsuri Gyan Mandir (Koba, Gandhinagar district, Gujarat), Dr. Kulshrestha and Mr. Acharya at the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute (Jodhpur), and the librarian at the Oriental and India Office Collections were kind enough to mail photocopies of manuscripts to me. I am also grateful to the librarian at the Oriental and India Office Collections for answering subsequent queries by e-mail. Kanchana Natarajan helped me photocopy articles from the library at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London.

Dr. Nandini Sinha and Prof. Kunal Chakrabarti kindly gave their permission for me to read Dr. Sinha's doctoral dissertation at the Centre for Historical Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University. Rawatji at the Centre for Linguistics and English, Jawaharlal Nehru University, has provided crucial help with administrative paperwork. Ashokji at A.P. Computers patiently printed out the final copy of this dissertation.

Jason Freitag and Cynthia Talbot provided me with a priceless reference from the Tod Collection at the Royal Asiatic Society, London. My chapter on Tod would not have been possible without their help. Martin Christop-Fuchsle sent me an abstract of his dissertation on nineteenth-century emendations of the Bhavishya Purana. I am grateful to him and to Vasudha Dalmia for their help.

Vijaya Ramaswamy, Monica Juneja, Kumkum Roy, Kathryn Hansen, Carla Petievich and Michelle Maskiell have all invited me to present various parts of this dissertation at seminars and conferences. I am grateful to them for providing me with invaluable opportunities to discuss my research with a larger audience.

Uma Chakravarti has gone out of her way in looking out for other helpful material, and photocopying it for me at her own initiative. Kathryn Hansen has lent me books and photocopied articles. To Carla Petievich, I owe a special debt of gratitude. She has gifted me with several unpublished Ph.D. dissertations from the United States, articles from journals not available in India, and forgotten versions of the Padmini legend from the India Office and Oriental Collections at the British Library.

I owe several debts to the college where I have taught, Miranda House. This research began in the English Department's Friday seminar group. I also learnt the tools of my craft at the English Department. And I am especially grateful to the college and to the Principal, Dr. Kiran Datar and then Dr. Urmil Rustogi, for providing me with three years' study leave and a subsequent extension of six months, which enabled me to complete this research.
My parents, Geetha and Rama, Minnie, Cheenu and Chinni have all helped with the monumental task of packing and shipping tons of books and papers half way across the world, so that I could complete this dissertation without interruption. My families have borne considerable financial burden so that I could work steadily at this research. Sreeni has put up patiently with the travails of a dissertation-writing and unemployed spouse.

Svati Joshi, Uma Chakravarti, Sudesh Vaid, Carla Petievich, Kathryn Hansen, Cynthia Talbot, Sumit Guha and Indrani Chatterji have read drafts of chapters. Their suggestions have ranged from alternate chapter plans to specific comments and criticisms. Much of this dissertation has emerged out of continuing conversations with each of them, on theory, method and content. For mistakes, the responsibility remains with me.

My friends have also provided steady emotional and intellectual support through severe disruptions in research and life. I owe special thanks to Svati, Uma, Sudesh, Manju, Ira, Kumkum, Carla, Kathy, Indrani and Ruth.

Finally, this dissertation would never have taken off but for the enthusiasm of my two original supervisors, Prof. Meenakshi Mukherjee and Prof. Harbans Mukhia. Dr. G.J.V. Prasad agreed to take over as my chief supervisor, at short notice. I am extremely grateful to him for all his support. Prof. Mukhia also made available to me Thomas de Bruijn's unpublished dissertation from the University of Leiden. I owe him special thanks. My three supervisors have been exceptionally encouraging over the course of the last five years, through many disruptions. In a very real sense, this dissertation would not have been completed without their steady support.
