The inspiration for this study, came from a cursory reference by Dr. Dilbagh Singh, to some immensely interesting information from Eastern Rajasthan and the amazing nature of sources preserved at the Rajasthan State Archives, Bikaner, in course of a class lecture at the Centre for Historical Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University in 1995. Scott’s Weapons of the Weak had by then, set me thinking and wondering about how little we, as students of medieval Indian history, know about peasant resistance. By drawing my attention to the archival records of the 17th and 18th centuries, Dr. Dilbagh Singh made it possible for me to undertake this effort to write the ‘unwritten’ history of peasant resistance. I will forever be indebted to him both for the inspiration as well as his critical evaluation of my arguments and interpretation of documents.

I am grateful to Professor Harbans Mukhia for his invaluable comments on sections of the thesis. It was very kind of him to give time patiently and ungrudgingly.

I would also like to thank Professor Majid Siddiqi for sharing with me the excitement about my research and for bearing with me and restoring my morale at all those moments when I was disheartened.

I am thankful to the staff of Rajasthan State Archives, Bikaner for their help, not just in procuring documents, but also for all the little things they did which made it possible for me to brave the heat and dust. I would also like to thank the staff of JNU library, ICHR library and the Central Secretariat Library. The scholarship given by the Jawaharlal Nehru Memorial Fund was a great help.

I could not have possibly completed this study without the constant assurance, support and encouragement given by my parents, family and friends.
