Acknowledgements

As with any piece of research, this thesis has drawn on a support system of teachers, family and friends, and I would like to use this opportunity to sincerely thank them all.

Over the course of these years, I have been guided by three supervisors during the different stages of my doctoral research. What would otherwise have been a potentially turbulent period turned out to be a huge plus, since I was able to draw upon the intellectual reserves of three leading IR scholars. To Professor Kanti Bajpai I owe the initial creative spark for helping me think through an exciting and challenging intellectual project. Professor Varun Sahni helped me flesh out and further develop what was a considerably nascent conceptual framework. I benefited from the guidance of Dr. Rajesh Rajagopalan whose insightful comments, patience in going through several drafts and prompt feedback made research a pleasant and rewarding experience.

I was fortunate to interact with some of the eminent experts in the field and their intellectual inputs proved invaluable in developing my work considerably. I wish to thank in particular Professor Barry Buzan, Professor Christopher Coker and Dr. Peter Wilson at the London School of Economics and Political Science for sharing their views on the subject. I also enjoyed the intense discussions I had with Professor Christopher Hill at the Cambridge University, Professor Theo Farrell at King’s College, and Dr. Marie Lall at the Institute of Education. Discussions with Dr. Daud Ali at the School of Oriental and African Studies and Srinath Raghavan at King’s College on related areas of interest were also deeply stimulating.

I wish to thank the School of International Studies, JNU for sponsoring my field trip to London which enabled me to incorporate vital inputs into my study by way of interviews and research material. The material that I mined from the libraries in Jawaharlal Nehru University, Institute of Defence and Strategic Analyses, Centre for Historical Studies, Indira Gandhi National Centre for the Arts, Indian Council of Historical Research and the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library proved invaluable to my research. I warmly appreciate the willing cooperation extended by their staff. I am also thankful to the staff at the India Office Library in the British Library, and at the libraries in the LSE and SOAS for their assistance in locating the excellent research material that they house. A research grant from the Charles Wallace India Trust made my extended stay in London possible during my field trip. I wish to thank the Trust for its help. I also owe a special thanks to Mr. Shahjahan for his meticulous attention to detail and for making sense of my scribbled notes with a cheerful disposition.

I dedicate this work to my parents who have always reposed faith in me to deliver. Especially to my father who has instilled in me the conviction to pursue research with rigour and an open-ended scholarly enquiry. Amma has always been a source of support, loving and patient as only a mother can be. This work is as much theirs as mine. This is also for my dear sister- constant companion, mentor and formidable ally- who has safely seen me through the turbulent ups and downs of research with her inimitable spirit, wit and grace. Thanks also to BB, for believing in me and for encouraging me to think freely and critically. I have unreservedly drawn upon his infinite reserves of patience and generosity. I also owe a lot to Ammachi, whose blessings and goodness got me this far; and to Sheila and Thamboose for the camaraderie we share. To Devika aka Shroopie, a special thanks for being there with her lively banter and for the bonding that the challenge of working on our doctoral research brought out. To dear Jaya and Alka, who have been waiting all these years to hear me utter the blessed words that I have finally submitted! I also owe a big thanks to Ananthy Akka and Baskaran Uncle for taking me in for two months during my field work in London. It was comforting to return to the familiarity of their home after a long day. Finally, this is to Boo, Gutar and Hurley-my guardian angels, who saw me through, as always.
