ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am grateful to a number of people, who have supported me to carry out this research.

First, my deepest gratitude and thanks are addressed to my Ph.D supervisor, Dr. Alka Acharya, for sharing her impressive knowledge and for insightful comments on this thesis. Without her generosity, encouragement and invaluable guidance, I would never have finished it.

Secondly, I would like to thank all the rest of the academic and support staff of the Center for East Asian Studies and the School of International Studies at the Jawaharlal Nehru University. Much respect goes to Prof. Lalima Varma and Prof. H.S. Prabakar, who offered me a variety of help in the past three years.

I also thank the staff of the JNU Library and the IDSA (Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses) Library for the support extended.

Furthermore, I would like to express my gratitude to Dr. C. Raja Mohan, who generously shared his great knowledge during classes, where he taught India’s Foreign Policy and Security in South Asia from August 2004 to May 2005, when he was a professor with the Center for South Asian Studies, SIS, JNU. I especially appreciate the valuable insights he offered during and outside class discussions.

A special word of thanks also goes to Dr. Xuetong Yan, Director of the Institute of International Studies at the Tsinghua University. Despite his many preoccupations, he found time to share his insights into Wendt’s constructivism and China’s new security concept, through direct discussions or by e-mails.

Last but not least, I would like to thank all the professors, students, and Indian friends I have met in the last few years, for their great hospitality and help during my studies in India.
