To Susan, who so wonderfully knows, how everyone is caught into what they can never fully recover from, yet one must persist, as she insists and exhibits. Her comments on a number of drafts have made the thesis take this form. The drafts were written in the spirit of following or even imitating her style of working for long hours in a day. She inspirationally carries teaching with research, both as a requirement and as a 'natural' necessity. Generations of students draw from that labour and learn in addition to the courses, I partook the same little share from her expansive discursive lectures and that has guided, more than any original inception of my own, the ways in which I conceive teaching and research. This work would not have happened without her being there.

To family, which provided nothing less than first hand emergencies and last minute catharses but was never able to relate with the work of academics, what can be termed in the words of Adonis, is partly like that of ‘removing clays and pebbles from the eyes of the dead’ (The New Noah) and rest of it like what Walter Benjamin says, is, in approaching ‘a book as lovingly as a cannibal spices a baby’ (One Way Street).

Mummy and Nani for their generous heartfelt blessings, for their being together in trials and for sharing their tribulations with me. The Mamas for providentially bringing me to Delhi and the Mamis for inhabiting the level ground of that providence with me in our mixed fates. Didi and Rajesh for living it out, through it all. To Usha, my dear sister, who is really the champion in the family, old style, sacrifices and all.

And to him, who understands, not just academics but life, war, religion and other metaphysical confectioneries with their bitter kernel intact, Nana — ‘the captain of the shipwrecked crew’. As I write this, you lie tethered to life saving catheters pumping abstract elixirs. It is true, you have seen almost everyone in the family falling from the stairs. I can not help thinking that even in your astoundingly pathetic fall that we are witnessing, there must be a lesson for us to reorganize our forthcoming crises. You started it all for me and we remained together in your daily diary. I will get by, but I must aspire to your magnificence, which is what your ‘superstitious faith’ in my abilities always implored me to.
To family again, Gita, for agreeing so warmly to teach in day to day conversations. For showing in practice what Susan has made famous ‘16 hrs of work, Ravi!’ For her Homo Ludens ways and unassuming communication that research is joy, what is researched and what is found may not always be. To Sushil, for babysitting me, chronicling my blues, never insisting upon me to sing, exchanging notes on films and friends, feeding me — the spinach omelet inspired me out of one of the writing blocks, and for extending architectural kinship to my pigeonnière.

To Geetika, for her love, stoic and triumphant endurance with my “fresh” drafts, for inhabiting — now almost a longue duré in the measure of clock time — a shared interest in what we each start on our own. For her hair splitting of what I think is abstractly luminous and self evident. And again and again for her love and companionship.

To Prof. Bettina Bäumer, for her provision of residence at IIAS, Shimla and introducing me to the thoughts of Raimon Panikkar amongst many others, later for, extending that support in the form of offering residence at her Samne Ghat house for my summer fieldwork and ensuring that I am fed properly and remain in good health. I am grateful to her, for her kind support through the entire research stint.

While at Samne Ghat, Asit, Anil and Ajay — in their alphabetical assonance, received and directed me in the city with great warmth. Particularly Anil, who accompanied me to different field sites in Benares with his own ethnographic commentary and introduced me to the high priest of Kabirmath — who otherwise refused meeting anyone taciturnly.

To my colleagues at Hindu College, Achla, Gitika, Shalini, particularly Shalini for facilitating a much needed earned leave during her tenure as the Teacher-in charge of the department.

To Sonu, for identifying with the work of research and taking initiative to witness the sites of my fieldwork at her stay in Benares.

To friends, Shipra, Parth, and Ankita for breaking the shell in which I gradually pushed myself while working on the thesis and also for egging me to get back to that shell, so that eventually the thesis comes out of the hatch at the Barsaati. Yann, incidentally has another metaphor for it. He cheered it as my “premarital baby”. So, to him, for his sense of humour, what with him being a priest at the Vatican, scandals are allowed within the realms of friendships. Shashank for perennially raising the discordant notes that he reflexively morphs with Jazz forms and with this combination he remains a source of joy. Arnab, Karan and Maurya for introducing me to world cinema, photography and most importantly to sheer excellence and autonomy in the practising of their respective fields. Donny, Vikas, Deo for their gratuitous celebration of our familiarity. The 6 O’ Clock Badminton team for the rallies and the smashes that won the day each evening for me. Gupta, Nagi, Sharma, Victor, Govind and Saini, this one is 15:0, for once. Onto the next Game!

To libraries and photocopy services, Ratan Tata Library, DSE and Rameshwari Photocopy services, JNU Central library, FIRC New Delhi, Abhinavagupta Research library, Varanasi, IIAS library Shimla, IEG library New Delhi, Hindu College library and most endearingly to Harmony bookshop, Varanasi. I used Harmony as a library and on top of it, Rakesh offered Chai to the regular browsers. To Rakesh and Govindababa who are now dear friends and not to be missed, it was harmony where I found “The Parallax View”.

Obituary

Papa, who died, misdiagnosed, missing his tractor and the sickle. I wish like Celan that there is a ‘grave’ for him ‘in the air’ where he won’t ‘lie too cramped’ (Death fugue) but as he always told me, he may still be more comfortable with the leeches of his wet paddy fields that he used as metaphor for afflictions of fate. When one is bled, is a time chosen by the blood spilling two mouthed, one piece of palpitating life form, we can do little against. Then you lie there, not in the air, but in the green water where the paddy crop decomposes and stands still, where the hyacinth choke the fish but the heron gets its’ feed.
